About the 1st of June he was honorably dismissed from the military family of Gen. Bragg, and, in company with a young man, his Adjutant, Lieut. W. G. Peter, of Baltimore, deliberately, and without the knowledge of any one, made the daring attempt of inspecting the outposts of the Federals. This attempt was never understood. It could not have resulted in anything of value to the Confederacy, and was, of course, fraught with the most serious consequences. It was asserted by them, in their last moments, to have been an effort to pass into the lines for the purpose of reaching their Northern homes. The true reasons will never be known, as the unseemly and fearful haste with which their fate was decided gave them no time to bring to their aid the influence of friends or reason. I am disposed to believe it was only a thoughtless and reckless attempt to do some romantic action that, from its very hardihood, would reflect a sort of notoriety upon men soured by disappointed ambition.

There seems to have been an unaccountable fatality about the whole transaction. Their daring action bid fair to

AN ACCOUNT BY AN EYE-WITNESS.

Last evening, June 9, 1863, about sundown, two strangers rode into camp and called at Col. Baird's headquarters in Franklin, Tenn., who presented an unusual appearance. They had on citizens' overcoats, Federal regulation pants and caps. The caps were covered with white flannel havelocks. They wore side-arms, and showed high intelligence. One claimed to be a Colonel in the United States army, and called himself Col. Austin; the other called himself Maj. Dunlap, and both represented themselves as Inspector Generals of the United States army. They represented that they were then out on an expedition in this department inspecting the outposts and defenses, and that day before yesterday they had been overhauled by the enemy and had lost their coats and purses. They exhibited official papers from Gen. Rosecrans, and also from the War Department at Washington, confirming their rank and business. These were all right to Col. Baird, and he felt satisfied of their honesty. They asked the Colonel to lend them $50, as they had no coats and no money to buy them. Col. Baird loaned them the money and took Col. Austin's note for it. Just at dark they started, saying they were going to Nashville, and took that way. Just as soon as they started the thought of their being spies struck Col. Baird, he says, like a thunderbolt, and he ordered Col. Watkins, of the Sixth Kentucky Cavalry, who was standing by, to arrest them immediately. But they were going at lightning speed; Col. Watkins had no time to call a guard, and only with his orderly he set out on the chase. He ordered the orderly to unsling his carbine, and if, when he halted them, they showed any suspicious motions, to fire upon them without waiting for an order. They were overtaken about one-third of a mile from here. Col. Watkins told them that Col. Baird wanted to make some further inquires of them and asked them to return. This they politely consented to do, after some remonstrances on account of the lateness of the hour and the distance they had to travel, and Col. Watkins led them to his tent, where he placed a strong guard over them. It was not until one of them attempted to pass the guard at the door that they even suspected they were prisoners. Col. Watkins immediately brought them to Col. Baird under strong guard. They at once manifested great uneasiness, and pretended great indignation at being thus treated. Col. Baird frankly told them that he had his suspicions of their true character, and that they should, if loyal, object to no unnecessary caution. They were very hard to satisfy, and were in a great hurry to get off. Col. Baird told them he had them under arrest, and that he should hold them prisoners until he was satisfied that they were what they purported to be. He immediately telegraphed to Gen. Rosecrans, and received the answer that he knew nothing of any such men; that there were no such men in his employ or had his pass.

Long before this dispatch was received, every one who had an opportunity of hearing their conversation was well satisfied they were spies. Smart as they were, they gave frequent and distinct evidence of duplicity. After this dispatch came to hand, which it did about 12 o'clock (midnight), a search of their persons was ordered. To this the Major consented without opposition, but the Colonel protested against it, and even put his hand to his arms. When the Major's sword was drawn from the scabbard, there was found etched upon it these words, "Lt. W. G. Peter, C. S. A." At this discovery, Col. Baird remarked: "Gentlemen, you have played this d—d well." "Yes," said Lieut. Peter, "and it came near being a perfect success." They then confessed the whole matter, and upon further search various papers showing their guilt were discovered upon their persons. Lieut. Peter was found to have on a rebel cap, secreted by the white flannel havelock.

Col. Baird immediately telegraphed the facts to Gen. Rosecrans, and asked what he should do, and in a short time received an order "to try them by drum-head court-martial, and, if found guilty, to hang them immediately." The court was convened, and, before daylight, the case was decided and the prisoners informed that they must prepare for immediate death by hanging.

At daylight men were detailed to make a scaffold. The prisoners were visited by the Chaplain of the Seventy-eighth Illinois, who, upon their request, administered the sacrament to them. They also wrote some letters to their friends, and deposited their jewelry, silver cups and other valuables for transmission to their friends.

The gallows was constructed by a wild cherry-tree, not far from the depot, and in a very public place. Two ropes hung dangling from the beam, reaching within eight feet of the ground. A little after 9 o'clock a. m. the whole garrison was marshaled around the place of execution in solemn sadness. Two poplar coffins were lying a few feet away. Twenty minutes past 9 the guard conducted the prisoners to the scaffold. They walked firm and steady, as if unmindful of the fearful precipice they were approaching. The guards did them the honor to walk with their arms reversed.

Arriving at the place of execution, they stepped upon the platform of the cart and took their respective places. The Provost Marshal, Capt. Alexander, then tied a linen handkerchief over the face of each and adjusted the ropes. They then asked the privilege of bidding a last farewell, which, being granted, they tenderly embraced each other. This over, the cart moved from under them, and they hung in the air. What a fearful penalty! They swung off at 9:30. In two minutes the Lieutenant ceased to struggle. The Colonel caught hold of the rope with both hands and raised himself up at three minutes, and ceased to struggle in five minutes. At six minutes, Dr. Forrester, Surgeon of the Sixth Kentucky Cavalry; Dr. Moss, Seventy-eighth Illinois Infantry, and myself, who had been detailed to examine the bodies, approached them and found the pulse of both full and strong. At seven minutes the Colonel shrugged his shoulders. The pulse of each continued to beat seventeen minutes, and in twenty minutes all signs of life had ceased. The bodies were cut down in thirty minutes, and incoffined in full dress. The Colonel was buried with a gold locket and chain on his neck. The locket contained the portrait and a braid of hair of his intended wife; her portrait was also in his vest pocket. These were buried with him at his request. Both men were buried in the same grave.

I should have stated in another place that the prisoners did not want their punishment delayed, but, well knowing the consequences of their act, even before their trial asked to have the sentence, either by hanging or shooting, quickly decided and executed. But they deprecated the idea of death by hanging, and asked for a commutation of the sentence to shooting.

The elder and leader of these unfortunate men was Laurence Williams, of Georgetown, D. C. He was as fine a looking man as I have ever seen, about six feet high and perhaps 30 years old. He was a son of Capt. Williams, who was killed at the battle of Monterey. He was one of the most intellectual and accomplished men I have ever known. I have never known any one who excelled him as a talker. He was a member of the regular army, with the rank of Captain of cavalry, when the Rebellion broke out, and at that time was Aide-de-Camp and Private Secretary to Gen. Winfield Scott. From this confidence and respect shown him by so distinguished a man may be judged his education and accomplishments. He was a first cousin to Gen. Lee, commanding the Confederate army of the Rappahannock. He was awhile on Gen. Bragg's staff as Chief of Artillery, but at the time of his death was Inspector [illegible]. When he entered the Confederate [illegible] he altered his name, and now signs it Laurence W. Orton, Col. Cav. P. A. C. S. (Provisional army, Confederate States [illegible]rica.) Sometimes he writes his name [illegible] and sometimes "Auton," according to [illegible] he has in view. This we learn from [illegible] found on him. These facts in relation to [illegible]sonal history of Col. Orton I have gathered from the Colonel himself and from Col. [illegible], who knows him well, they having be[illegible] to the same regiment of the regular [illegible] Second United States cavalry. Col. Wat[illegible] not recognize him, however, until he [illegible] himself known, and now mourns his [illegible]y and tragic fate.

[illegible] other victim of this delusive and reckless [illegible] was Walter G. Peter, a Lieutenant in [illegible] army, and Col. Orton's Adjutant. He [illegible] tall, handsome young man of about 25 and gave many signs of education and [illegible]ment. Of his history I have been able to [illegible] nothing. He played but a second part. [illegible]rton was the leader and did all the talking and managing.

Such were the characters and the men who played the awful tragedy. History will hardly furnish its parallel in the character and standing of the parties, the boldness and daring of the enterprise, and the swiftness with which discovery and punishment were visited upon them. They came into our camp and went all through it, minutely inspecting our positions, works and forces, with a portion of their traitorous insignia upon them, and the boldness of their conduct made their flimsy subterfuges almost successful.

To the last, however, they denied being spies. They claimed that they were endeavoring to get through our lines to visit friends in the North and in Europe. But that story was so poorly matured that when either told it would not hang together, and there was little resemblance between the accounts which the two gave. The arrest so completely confounded them that they were never afterward able to recover from it. The unfortunate men made no complaint of the severity of their punishment, except that they deprecated the ignominy of being hung. They were too well-informed not to know that on conviction of being spies they must suffer death, and hence they expected it. Col. Orton, who recognized Col. Watkins as soon as he saw him, told him that he barely escaped with his life when the arrest was made; that he had his hand on his pistol to kill him and escape; that had it been any one else he would have done so.

Col. Orton delivered his sword and pistol to Col. Watkins, and told him to keep and wear them. He also presented him with his horse, which he valued at $5,000, and asked him to treat it kindly for his sake.

We are all sad over this event. There is a gloom on every face. Although we are fully satisfied that the mission of these men was to plan our destruction; and that even they recognized their punishment as just according to the accepted rule of war among all nations, still to see such men suffer such a penalty has filled our garrison with sadness.

W. H.,
Surgeon Thirty-fifth Indiana.

The execution of these men was, in several respects, without a parallel in history. From the connections of the men involved, and the wonderful speed with which they were hurried into eternity, it stands without an equal. It seemed as if the intention was to cut off all chance for interference on the part of frends or relations. In the main army the event produced much less feeling than would have seemed possible, but "Col. Orton" had succeeded so admirably in making himself odious to every one, that, hardened as they were to suffering and death, but little sympathy was felt or expressed for him. Every one felt sorry for Lieut. Peter but for Col. Orton little was seen or felt. After the war these men were disinterred and carried to their homes.—Col. Clark, in the Nashville American.

That Checker-Board.

Up to three weeks ago such a thing as a checker-board was never known in Mr. Grattan's house. He and his aged partner have managed to pass the long evenings very pleasantly, and he supposed they were happy enough until a friend from the East paid them a flying visit and asserted over and over again that the game of checkers was not only all the rage there, but that it served to quicken the perceptive faculties, enlarge the mind and render the brain more active. After giving the subject due thought, Mr. Grattan walked down town and purchased a checker-board, and when evening came he surprised his good wife by bringing it in from the wood-shed, and saying:

"Well, Martha, we'll have a game or two before we go over to the social. I expect to beat you all to flinders, but you won't care."

"Of course not, and if I beat you, why you won't care."

They sat down, and he claimed the first move. She at once objected, but when he began to grow red in the face she yielded and he led off. At the fourth move she took a man, chuckling as she raised him.

"I don't see anything to grin at," he sneered as he moved a man backward.

"Here! you can't move that way!" she called out.

"I can't, eh? Perhaps I never played checkers before you was born."

She saw a chance to jump two more men and gave up the point, but as she moved he cried out:

"Put them right back there! I've concluded not to move backward, even if Hoyle does permit it!"

She gave in again, but when he jumped a man her nose grew red, and she cried out:

"I didn't mean to move there; I was thinking of the social."

"Can't help the social, Martha—we must go by Hoyle."

In about two minutes she jumped two men and went into the king row, shouting:

"Crown him! crown him! I've got a king!"

"One would think by your childish actions that you never played a game before!" he growled out.

"I know enough to beat you!"

"You do, eh? Some folks are awful smart."

"And some folks ain't!" she snapped, as her king captured another man.

"What in thunder are you jumping that way for?"

"A king can jump any way!"

"No, he can't."

"Yes, he can!"

"Don't talk back to me, Martha Grattan! I was playing checkers when you were in your cradle!"

"I don't care. I can jump two men whichever way you move!"

He looked down on the board, saw that such was the case, and roared out:

"You moved twice to my once!"

"I haven't!"

"I'll take my oath you have! I can't play against any such blackleg practices!"

"Who's a blackleg? You not only cheated, but you tried to lie out of it!"

Board and checkers fell between them. He could get his hat on quicker than she could find her bonnet, and that was the only reason why he got out of the house first. A Woodward avenue grocer found him sitting on a basket of cranberries at the door as he was closing up for the night, and asked him if he was waiting for his wife to come along.

"Well, not exactly; I stopped here to feel in my pocket for the key of the barn. I shall sleep on the hay to-night, and see if it won't cure that cold in my head!"—Detroit Free Press.

JOHN ERICSSON.

The Boyhood of a Great Engineer.

Col. W. C. Church contributes to the April Scribner a notable and important paper on Ericsson, the engineer, inventor of steam fire-engines, the screw propeller, the Monitor, etc., etc., etc. As will be seen by the following extract from the magazine, with Ericsson, as with others, "the child is father to the man:"

Before he was 11 years old, during the winter of 1813, John had produced a saw-mill of ingenious construction, and had planned a pumping-engine designed to clear the mines of water. The frame of the saw-mill was of wood; the saw-blade was made from a watch-spring, and the crank which actuated it was cast from a broken tin spoon. A file, borrowed from a neighboring blacksmith, to cut the teeth, a gimlet, and the ubiquitous jack-knife, were the only tools available for this work. A much more ambitious undertaking was the pumping-engine. The year before, when only 9 years of age, young Ericsson had made the acquaintance of drawing instruments in one of the draught offices of the grand ship canal of Sweden, and learned how these instruments were used to lay out the work of construction in advance. Meanwhile, his father had removed to the depths of a pine forest, where he selected the timber for the lock-gates of the canal. In this wilderness, a quill and pencil were the boy's utmost resources in the way of drawing tools. Like Crusoe on his island, he had to begin at the beginning. He made compasses of birch wood, with needles inserted in the ends of their legs. A pair of steel tweezers, obtained from his mother's dressing-case, were converted into a drawing pen, and the same good mother was persuaded, after much entreaty, to allow her sable cloak to be robbed of hair enough to provide material for two small brushes with which to apply the coloring at that time deemed essential in all mechanical drawings. The pumping engine was to be operated by a wind-mill, and here the youthful inventor was at fault. He had heard much about a wind-mill, but had never seen one. Following, as well as he could, the description of those who had had the happiness to view this wonderful machine, he succeeded in constructing on paper the mechanism connecting the crank of the wind-mill shaft with the pump levers, but how to turn the mill to the changing wind he could not divine. Fortunately, John's father made a visit to the wind-mill, and, in describing what he had seen, spoke of a "ball and socket joint." The hint was sufficient; the boy rushed to his drawing table and had soon added a ball and socket joint where the connecting rod for the driving crank joined the pump lever. With the execution of this drawing began John Ericsson's mechanical career. The plan conceived and executed under such discouraging circumstances by a mere child attracted the attention of Admiral Count Platen, the President of the Gotha ship canal, on which Ericsson's father was employed, and one of Sweden's great men. "Continue as you have begun and you will one day produce something extraordinary," prophesied the Count of his young protege. Richly has the prophecy been fulfilled.

Ericsson was appointed a cadet in the Swedish corps of mechanical engineers when he was 12 years old, was soon after promoted to nivelleur (leveler) and at the age of 13 was put in charge of a section of the ship canal over which his friend, the Count, presided. Six hundred of the royal troops, at work upon this section, looked for directions in their daily work to this child, among whose necessary attendants was one who followed after him with the stool upon which he stood to raise himself to the height of his leveling instruments. The amusements of this boy-engineer are indicated by his possession at the age of 15 of a portfolio of drawings, made in his leisure moments, giving maps of the most important parts of the grand canal, 300 miles in length, and showing all the machinery and implements used in its construction. Many important works upon this canal, which opens an inland channel across Sweden from the Baltic to the North sea, were constructed from drawings made by Ericsson at an age when he might rather have been expected to be found playing foot-ball.

How Carthage Appears To-day.

The New York of Antiquity, as Carthage may fairly be called, is so essentially a thing of the past that to approach it by railway appears quite a solecism. Rome and Damascus are still living cities, and there is nothing unnatural in entering one by train and the other by stage; but it certainly does seem incongruous to rattle up in a well-cushioned steam car, with a first-class ticket in one's pocket, to the site of a capital whose independent existence ended 2,000 years ago. Nevertheless, the spot is well worth visiting, if only for the sake of the cordial welcome and inexhaustible information given to all comers by good Father Bresson, of the French mission, whose neat little chapel of St. Louis, with its low, white wall and embowering foliage, marks the spot where the last of the crusading Kings of France perished ruthlessly in 1270. From the central point, once the actual citadel of Carthage, what is left of the famous city may be taken in at a glance. In the garden of the chapel itself, a few uneven blocks of fire-charred stone mark the site of the Temple of Æsculapius, which the last defenders of Carthage fired over their own heads when all was lost. On the summit of the same ridge one solitary fragment of crumbling masonry represents the palace of Dido. The Temple of Jupiter, where Hannibal swore his fatal oath of eternal enmity to Rome, shows its half-destroyed foundation through heaps of rubbish, a little to the right; while all around the base of the hill lie, thick as hail, the smooth, round sling stones that dealt death among the Roman legionaries as they came charging up the slope on a bright summer morning in 146 B. C. Far out on the plain the course of Adrian's aqueduct is marked by a line of broken arches, and a little Arab village stands on the spot where Regulus fought his last battle, while a vast hollow on either side of the railway betrays the site of the famous circus where the "Martyrs of Carthage" died for their faith. This smooth plateau, sloping down to the sea, so thickly strewn with ruins that every step crushes some fragment of the ancient city, was once the fashionable quarter of the Punic beau monde, traversed by the Carthagenian Broadway, the Via Coelestis, leading to the great theater, whose circular basement is still visible beside the broken remnants of the gymnasium. On the brow of the hill above still linger a few traces of the fort that defended the harbor, and below it, last and grandest of all, is the splendid reservoir whose mighty arches, overshadowing the deep, still water beneath, have all the effect of a Gothic cathedral built over a Venetian canal.—Foreign letter.

CO-OPERATION.

How It Is Successfully Practiced in England.

The figures which represent the sales of one of the London co-operative stores—the "Army and Navy"—as set forth in an article by Mr. J. H. Lawson in the latest number of the Nineteenth Century, are as follows: First year's business, $651,405; third year's, $2,177,260; fifth year's, $4,561,740, and the seventh and last year's, $7,700,000. Mr. Lawson considers various grievances which the shopkeepers have, speaking of one as follows;

"The final and most important plea is the serious injury that is being done to the tradesmen themselves. This is a matter which deserves the fullest sympathy and the most grave consideration. Sorry as all must be, there is no doubt about it that the shopkeepers must suffer from the process, which will gradually lead to their almost total extinction; and how to alleviate that suffering is the point to which public attention should be directed. To attempt to do so by the abolition of co-operative stores would be futile, as they have taken too deep a root. As well might we demand the extinction of railways and the restoration of the old stage coaches. Progress cannot be impeded. Should the electric light prove a success, no consideration for the losses of the gas companies will prevent its adoption."

One of these London societies has become a manufacturer on an extensive and increasing scale, which is thus described:

"A very large number of workingmen are employed on the premises in tailoring, and more than 100 women are constantly at shirt-making, receiving good and even liberal wages, in favorable contrast with those exposed in Hood's famous "Song of the Shirt;" and it must be some satisfaction to the wearers of these garments that, though they get them at reduced prices, that reduction has not been wrung from the misery of the poor workers. It embarks, moreover, in mantle-making, perfumes, and in the manufacture of portmanteaus, dressing-bags, purses, and other leather goods, tin-work, japanned ware, cabinets, etc., in fancy woods, also in printing and die-sinking. This may be deprecated by many, but the society has, in fact, been forced into it by the difficulty, and almost in some instances impossibility, of procuring really sound and good articles that could be confidently warranted to its members, owing to the system of scamping and concealing defects. The results have quite kept pace with the most sanguine expectations. The prices have been reduced, the members are satisfied, and the workingmen, many of them the best in their respective trades, are well content."

Mr. Lawson closes with a rose-colored prediction of the future of co-operation:

"It will thus be seen that co-operative societies are likely to prove friends to the workingman, however they may affect the traders; and another beneficial effect, a national one, must follow. By largely reducing the selling prices of these manufactures, they compete more favorably with those of foreign production, and tend, therefore, to keep the trade in our own hands."

Wanted Collateral.

The first part of the present week hay became very scarce in this market, and consequently went up, up, until it sold as high as 15 cents a pound. The night after the raise a man drove up to one of our corrals with a span of rather lean horses, which he had just driven over the range. He called out to the corral keeper:

"Say, Captain, I'd like to leave my outfit here."

"All right, sir; drive in."

"Step into the office and leave yoru name and where you can be found."

The stranger did as requested, and, while the corral man was putting up the team, he passed out of the office and up the street.

The clerk called to the boss as soon as the owner of team had cleared the stable:

"Say, that man is going to Ten Mile in the morning, to be gone a week."

"The d—l! Call him back."

The clerk hallooed him back, when the corral man said:

"Going to leave this team here a week?"

"Yes, sir; about a week, I reckon."

"Well, my friend, you will have to leave some security for the care and feed of this team."

"Heavens, man," replied the stranger, "ain't the team security enough?"

"No, sir; hay is worth $150 a ton, and if you should leave that team in my care for a week, and anything should happen to prevent your coming back for it, the horses and wagon wouldn't bring enough to cover the livery bill. I'd rather you'd take 'em somewhere else."—Leadville Chronicle.

THE OLD SCHOOL-BOOK.

On the old school-book, in the [illegible]
With a tearful eye I gaze;
Come down, old friend, for an hour we'll spend
In talking of by-gone days. O
I gaze once more, as in days of yore,
On the task that vexed the brain;
The lesson done, and victory won,
And I feel I'm a child again.

And I seem to stand with the youthful band
In the old house on the green;
I hear the fun ere the school began,
And I join in the gladsome scene,
I take my place, with a sober face;
O'er the well-carved desk I bend,
And hourly pore o'er the antique lore
Of thy wonderful page, old friend.

Then our cares were few, and our friends were [illegible]
And our griefs were rare and light;
The world was naught—so we fondly thought!—
But a region of pure delight.
But time has sped, and our path has led
Through the dark and tearful scene;
And passed away are the good and gay,
Like the old house on the green.

But we'll sing no more of the days of yore,
For the tear-drop dims the eye.
Sleep on, old book, in thy dusty nook,
As in years that have glided by.
No guilt we trace in thy honest face,
But a mine of gold within
Enriched the youth, as they sought for truth,
In the old house on the green.

"Boy," said the man, holding an inverted match in one hand and a dark cigar in the other, "never acquire the pernicious habit of smoking. I am a slave to it now, and yet I hate it. I never see a cigar that I do not want to burn it up." And then, with extreme satisfaction, he burned up the one he had in his hand.—Burdette.

A LOVER'S QUESTION.

A little mole is growing, John,
Just underneath my chin:
It gives me so much grief, dear John,
I'm growing pale and thin.
Another one is coming, John,
Just here beneath my ear,
And I will be disfigured, John,
For life, I sadly fear.
And so I want to ask you, John,
Will e'er your love grow cold?
Oh, answer me at once, dear John,
Will you love me when I'm moled?

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES

Forsaken.

The sky is cheerless with clouds of gloom;
 The boughs are bare and the leaves are shed;
The rushes sway to the surging tune
 Of a stream whose music is dull and dead;
And never a gleam of sun o'erhead,
 And never a blade of grass left green;
And crystal jewels all strewn and spread
 Where thousand flushes of bloom have been.

The birds are singing no song of joy;
 The ivy covers an empty nest;
Will chill of the winter's breath destroy
 The light of summer within my breast?
For comes the touch of a doubt unblest,
 And it breaks the calm of a tender dream,
And the crystal cold of his hand has [illegible]
 My [illegible] might have been.

O weeping rushes and shivering birds,
 O stream that has never a song to sing,
O fickle swallows who heard his words,
 Half whispered here in the silver spring,
My sighs with you to the south may bring
 The old, old story of trust betrayed;
For here I weep, while on wayward wing
 You flit and flutter through sun and shade.

I see you fly where my love has flown;
 I see you following the shimmering track
Of a sun-light spread on a sea sun-strown
 With rays that never may lead him back;
For few and fickle are the vows that lack
 The truth that lives in the far, far north;
O love, O life, that you might come back,
 If only to tell me what love is worth!

Is it worth a summer of bliss divine,
 Or a thousand kisses in hours of night,
Or a thousand vows that proclaim you mine,
 Or a wrong that never can be set right?
Is it worth the shedding of tears that blight
 These eyes whose lustre you loved so well?
Is it worth the loss of a life's delight
 To love too little—or love too well?

O sorrowful eyes all dark and dim,
 That look at me from an amber cloud—
A cloud that was burnished gold to him,
 Who touched it once with a touch so proud!
O face that has gathered the winter's chill
 On lips and brow that to him were vowed!
I would you could follow him where he will,
 Or—sink to rest in the summer's shroud!

French Cookery.

It is not so much the preparation of food that surprises the new-comer in France, as the food itself. The things that French people eat it would be a mild form of speech to say was refuse to give to animals, because for the most part many things that the French do eat we Americans do not consider as food at all. Such, for example, as snails, frogs, cats, horses, sparrows, and a small marine animal which, in England, are called peri-winkles. Add to this that no part of a beast, of whatever sort, is wasted, be it brain, brawn or what not. One of the most palatable of French dishes is a preparation of the toes of a sheep, a part of the animal that I will guarantee no American housewife ever dreams of using. The feet of sheep would naturally suggest itself as about the last thing to nourish the human body, but I must confess that the preparation of it gives it a flavor and form which make it really delicious, the original "toes," gristle and bone, of the pedal extremities, being boiled for possibly a week, and served on the table in about the condition of well boiled beef, dressed with sauce which gives it a flavor not unlike that of stewed oysters. The dish is not costly, and though not costly, is not confined to any class, since all Frenchmen have about the same tastes for little preparations of this sort.

Yellow Hair.

The yellow hair which a number of actresses and many women off the stage affect, seems to be growing more and more common. It is not pleasant to see, however, because it is, in almost every instance, artificial, the result of dyeing, and artificiality is never agreeable for any length of time. Actresses have professional reasons—perhaps mistaken ones—for dyeing their hair; but other women have no excuse for it. They imagine, of course, that it adds to their beauty, or modifies their homeliness, which it certainly does not. The effect, indeed, is quite the contrary. Nature is very likely to understand the true principles of art. Although she may not make all women handsome, she generally furnishes them with complexion, eyes and hair to match. And when they bleach their hair they blunder æsthetically, wronging nature and themselves at the same time. The peculiar hue of the hair which is now the fashion with a certain class is almost always unbecoming, because it is unnatural. It advertises and emphasizes its artificiality, and conveys and unfavorable impression of the person who adopts it. No woman in civilization colors her hair blue, her nose red, her cheeks green or her teeth black. But if she did she would be acting very much like the woman who dyes her hair yellow—a dead, fictitious repellant hue. Yellow hair is apt to give an unprepossessing notion of the wearer. The man or woman of taste and good sense who sees it associates it with painted eyebrows, painted cheeks and other false things, spiritual not less than material. If these hair-dyers knew what men of the world mean by saying, "She is the sort of woman who bleaches her hair," they would think twice before they did it.—New York Times.

London Society.

London society is in a queer condition if we can believe L. J. Jennings, a careful writer, formerly of the New York Times, now London correspondent of the World. He says:

We have now entered upon the "pretty-woman" era, money itself being less sought after than beauty. If a man chances to have a pretty wife all doors are open to him—he can go anywhere, although, to be sure, he does not count for much when he does go. There are about half a dozen "beauties" now in London already to begin the season—married beauties, mind you, for bread-and-butter misses are no longer in fashion. The pretty married women are ever so much more piquant. The knowing people who want to form a "set" of acquaintance in the exclusive circle get these pretty ladies to their houses and all the men soon follow. Of course stories get about, how can one help that? People will talk, and a page of your paper will not contain all the scandalous tittle-tattle that goes from one house to another. A pretty-woman mania in a community is sure to be attended with disadvantages of that kind. But who cares? Not the pretty women apparently. Not their husbands. The key-note of the season has been struck, and it is a popular one. Ask all the good-looking young married women whom you can scrape acquaintance with to your house. Get six of them to dinner on one evening. Let them be dressed in the height of the mode, which is rather low. Ask a few of your male friends (all of the best ton, be it well understood) to drop into dinner. They will draw in fast enough, never fear. The word will soon reach far and wide that your parties are the best in London, and half the aristocracy will be begging for your invitations. Such is the prescription, and it is not an unpleasant one to take.

A Romance of Austrian Actresses.

Two beautiful actresses in Vienna, who had been intimate friends, quarreled, and had their case up in court, and the result was that one of them got judgment against the other for 10,000 marks. One of the fair ones had a sweetheart, a handsome young art student, whom she adored, but who went back on his vows in a most Theseus-like manner, at which the deceived girl went into tears, when suddenly from the mass of MSS. a lottery ticket dropped. Her fair friend was standing by vainly trying to console Mlle. Emilie, which was the forsaken one's name, and when the lottery ticket fell she implored her friend with tears not to throw it away. "Then you can take it," said Emilie, "for I will have nothing that came from that horrid, deceitful wretch." Her friend took it and after administering some more female consolation, went home. Two days after that Mlle. Emilie saw in the paper, which she always reads before getting up, that the number of that ticket had drawn 5,000 marks. She took the curl papers out of her hair and dressed herself in three minutes instead of two hours, as was her wont, and skipped to the room of her friend, saying, "I want my lottery ticket." "You mean you want your 5,000 marks, but you can't have it, my dear, because I've got it under the pillow now. You gave me the ticket, and the prize is mine." The porter heard a first-class whirlwind going up stairs, and reciprocal compliments of "audacious minx" and "immoral hussy," and ran up in time to see one young lady in a nymph-like scarcity of dress, standing in the middle of the floor covered with back hair, curl-papers, and other evidences of a recent battle. At the same moment Mlle. Emilie arrived, similarly attired, in the street through the window. She brought suit for damages, and got exactly the amount of the lottery ticket; and the strange adventure so interested the false lover that he returned, renewed his vows, was forgiven, borrowed the 5,000 marks, and left. So that Mlle. Emilie lost her lover, her friend, and her money, and is now a wiser, if not a better girl.

Looseness in Marrying.

In New York, where licenses to marry are not required, nor any legal form whatever, there is now a call for a requirement of license. One of the arguments used by a journal is to relieve ministers from the embarrassment of being called to marry persons of whom they know nothing. We have to remark that ministers can relieve themselves of this embarrassment by refusing to marry unknown persons. There is no proper necessity which requires a minister to marry persons who are unknown to him, and who come without means to be vouched for. When he does it to such persons, he voluntarily runs the risk of doing wrong for the sake of the marriage fee.

Persons who are fit to marry are known to some minister, or have friends to make them known. A minister's proper marriage business is limited to these. The rest he can leave to the magistrates, who have not large expectations of fees to make them careless whom they marry. Eloping couples also can well be left to these. When we read in the paper of an eloping Kentucky couple sending round in the night to rout out a minister to marry him, to save their characters, or under pretense of imminent paternal pursuit, and of his getting up with alacrity to do it, we are lead to think that he would be better placed in the Greek temple of Venus than in a modern Christian church.

There is much talk of the looseness of divorce. Does it not come largely from the looseness of marriage? If marrying is treated as a joke, why should not divorce be a capital joke? If marriage be a thing to jump into, why not to jump out of? When a silly girl runs away to marry some fellow of low character, the newspapers tell of it as true love triumphing over opposing parents, and there are not a few ministers who are ready to get up in the night to marry such, and who think they have done a good thing thereby. But is it not as much a triumph of true love over restraint when these break the bonds of marriage or one runs off with another fellow?

Recklessness in making marriages results in recklessness in divorce. Our public sentiment has favored the removal of all legal forms from marriage, as these, which only aim to verify, were obstacles to marriage. The sentiment and custom of American society abandon all precautions to protect daughters from unfit marriages. Daughters, as well as sons, treat any counsel or safeguard in this matter as an invasion of their rights, and a thing to be resented. The fellows come in and take possession of the society of the daughters without the slightest attention to the parents. With all this free and easy social custom and this abandonment by the law, is it not natural that we have looseness in divorce?—Cincinnati Gazette.

Fashion Notes.

BLACK satin dresses are fashionable.

EMBROIDERIES of black tulle are favored.

PANAMA tweeds are a new style of dress goods.

AMONG the new ornaments for bonnets are straw beads.

THE spring bonnets are large and have wide brims.

FRESH importations of rich millinery show many novelties.

FOR house shawls the favorite choice is the square Chuddah.

MOTHER-OF-PEARL embroideries are quite the rage for this season.

WHITE bonnets will be especially dressy with strings of Breton lace.

RUSTIC straw bonnets will be worn with mourning and traveling suits.

THE jet ornaments for black lace bonnets are the handsomest yet imported.

DARK navy blue and brown are the most fashionable colors for cambrics.

IT is difficult to make inexperienced persons believe that the deep Spanish lace collars, for example, have not superseded the plaited ruffle, and the narrow rim of linen at the throat.

ICICLE fringe for evening dresses is made of strings of white glass beads.

BRAZILIAN beetles will be used to ornament white chip and braid bonnets.

SHORT, scantily-gored skirts of gray mohair are made up for Balmoral petticoats.

BLACK net bonnets will be worn, with jet feathers and Breton lace for trimmings.

A GREAT deal of [illegible] shirring will be used on all thin fabrics in the summer.

CUIRASSES with paniers formed of rich fabrics are favored by some of our society ladies.

DOTTED Swiss muslins are made over colored silics, garnitured with lace and ribbons.

SATIN vests are worn without trimmings under the open waists. This style is very pretty.

NEW white muslin skirts are trimmed with two or three plaited frills of Hamburg embroidery.

CHEMISETTES will be worn with open corsages, which are expected to be in vogue next summer.

PURE silver gray, the real Quaker tint, will be contrasted with garnet and cardinal this summer.

SPRING suits are made short, with a draped polonaise, or deep, close basque and trimmed skirt, the flounce being kilt plaited or tripled box plaited and space between. With it is worn the straight mantelet knotted in front.

Disliked His Own Handiwork.

Altogether the most interesting feature of the meeting of the New York Academy of Sciences last Tuesday evening was the impromptu speech of Commander Homer C. Blake, of the United States navy. Dr. H. A. Mott, Jr., had read an elaborate paper upon torpedoes and the means of protection against them, including a new device of his own construction. At its conclusion the acting president of the society called upon Commodore Blake, who happened to be present. In response the commander said that he considered torpedoes the most demoralizing weapon of warfare. When it was determined to send ironclads up the James river as part of the combined attack upon Richmond, he was in command of the "Eutaw," and assigned to the duty of towing the monitor "Onondaga." The speaker said:

"So far as we were concerned the war was about to be terminated, for none of us thought we would get up the river, knowing that crowds of torpedoes had been placed over every shallow, and some of the men declined to go. I was sixth in the line at first, but I thought, if there was death and danger, the sooner it was met and over with the better; therefore, instead of slowing down at suspected places I went ahead, and before long I stood second in the line. We got nearly to Drury's point without a sign of a torpedo, and began to think they were a humbug and to laugh at our fears, when suddenly we saw the leading vessel, the "Commodore Jones," lifted bodily out of the water and blown into the merest fragments. Out of 60 men on board of her the only trace we could ever find was a piece of a man among the bushes about 300 yards away. We saw there was some virtue in torpedoes, and anchored on the spot, and I was ordered in charge of a party to clear the channel the next day.

"That night I received from Gen. Butler a characteristic letter. It read:

"'I send you a man who was found putting down torpedoes. If you can use him, do so; if not, hang him.'

"When the prisoner, a fine-looking, intelligent man, came, I asked him if the report concerning him was true.

"'Yes,' said he; 'what are you going to do about it?'

"'Well, read that letter,' said I.

"'Do you call that Christian warfare?' he asked, after reading it.

"'There is nothing Christian in war,' said I; 'but these orders will be obeyed unless you show us the easiest way to clear this channel.'

"He remained silent, and I left him sitting on a gun-carriage for a little while to think about it. Meanwhile Captain (now Commander) Fyffe came aboard, and noticing the prisoner asked me about. 'Let me have him,' he said; 'I can get something out of him.' So he took him, and a little while after I saw him put out up the river, with the rebel prisoner lashed to the cut-water. He only went about 300 yards when the man called out: 'Stop, Captain; stop, for God's sake! There's a torpedo just over there.' This one removed, it was not long before another was pointed out by the terrified man, and so we cleared the channel."—New York Evening Post.

An Ancient Odor of Spices.

An interesting archæological observation has recently been made quite accidentally. It is well known that urns found on Roman burial-grounds, and containing the bone remains of cremated bodies are often covered with clay cups or dishes. The object of these dishes was supposed to have been to contain spices, which sent forth agreeable odors during the progress of the cremation. Herr Dahlem, a well-known German archæologist, was able to verify this view in the following manner: He had obtained a dish of this kind which was broken, and after cementing it, had placed it upon a stove for the purpose of drying the cement. Shortly afterward he noticed a strong and by no means unpleasant odor proceeding from the heated dish. It seems, therefore, that the ingredients burned in the dish some fifteen centuries ago and had left traces behind, which announced their presence upon becoming heated. Herr Dahlem remarks that the odor was not unlike that of storax.—Nature.

IN the Russian paper Siberia we find a curious petition of a nobleman to a high imperial officer: "All your petitioners usually trouble you about the affairs of this life; but I beg leave to trouble you about my death. Though but thirty-seven years old, I shall soon depart this world, for my health is ruined. I trust my soul to God, but my body to you. The idea of its decay is the burden of my life; and therefore I respectfully request an order that it be burned on the woodpile, for which I have already provided twenty-five cords of wood."

Winter Sport in Russia.

The time to visit St. Petersburg is assuredly in the winter season. The characteristic Russian sports and entertainments mainly belong to the winter, and among these is the practice of making up parties to go out in troikas about ten miles from the city, on fine moonlight nights, for the purpose of coasting down the artificial ice-mountains. Once outside the city with a clear road ahead of him, the coachman emits a series of warwhoops and starts the horses off at a swinging pace, while the occupants of the sleigh keep him up to his work by yelling at him by intervals. A correspondent of the Boston Advertiser says she supposed they were calling him some very bad names, and was quite surprised when it was translated to find the following endearing epithets had been used: "Go on, my dove!" "Go on, my beauty!" and so on. She adds:

When I stood a the top of the hill and looked down that smooth precipice of ice my heart failed me, but I was not allowed to back out, and with many misgivings I got on the sled and pitched off the incline. There was a man who went behind on skates and guided us. I remember to have dreamed once that I was falling down a bottomless abyss, and certainly I thought the dream was being realized in the few seconds it took me to descend that hill. Such a horrible feeling of goneness as came over me I hope never to feel again. Yet people do this for pleasure! It is like reading accounts of murders; there is a horrible sort of fascination about it. In any case, it is the proper thing to go down the ice hills when one goes on a troika party; so, of course, we did it. Then we all went into a sort of restaurant, and after taking some hot tea we listened to the songs of Bohemians and watched them dance. The coming home was the most delightful part of the excursion. Rushing through the air with only the sleigh bells and gay voices to break the utter stillness around us, the snow fields stretching away on either side, the stars shining brightly above us, and finally the Neva, across which we sped, the long row of lights up and down the river on the side of the city, the deserted streets, and then home and a distant clock striking five. We ought to have had a runaway. Every one should on a troika party, but we escaped it.

A Robe of Glass.

In the large basement room of the home of S. Isaacs, at No. 1,434 Mission street, between Tenth and Eleventh, is now weaving the most wonderful fabric of which the voluminous history of unique feminine apparel furnishes any account. It is the material, as flexible as the finest of silk and as durable as Blue Jeans William's favorite stuff for trousers, for a lady's dress, and it is woven by the world-renowned artist in glasswork, Prof. Theodore Greiner, out of the innumerable colored strands of glass first spun by himself. Compared with the completed garment, the mythical glass slipper of the fabulous cinderella will sink into as vulgar an insignificance as an exhausted Napa soda-bottle. A Chronicle reporter called on him recently, and he very courteously showed him the entire process. Breaking an extra piece out of the soiled bottom of an already broken tumbler, he submitted it to the heat of a blow-pipe until it became incandescent and soft. Then with a "stick" of glass he touched the molten portion, and with an expert motion, which may be described as a flip, he carried a thread so fine that it was almost invisible till it caught on the disc of a slowly-revolving wide wooden wheel of nineteen feet circumference. At a certain number of revolutions the strand was complete, and the wheel was stopped and it is removed. It then consisted of innumerable softly glistening threads, finer than the finest of floss silk. These strands are spun of all colors, and are then washed in a solution of water and beet-root sugar, which toughens them. The spinning is all done and occupied many weeks. The weaving is done on an old-fashioned hand-loom, the warp being nineteen feet long and the woof four feet, so that the material will cut to advantage. Only about ten inches a day can be woven, and the whole piece will not be completed until some time in April.—San Francisco Chronicle.

A Good Word for Dragons.

Mr. Waterhouse Hawkins, eminent in scientific circles on both sides of the Atlantic, in a recent lecture before the London institution, openly affirmed his belief in the existence of dragons in the days of yore. He urged that our forefathers used their wits like ourselves, and could trust the evidence of their senses. The ancient myths were not founded on fancy, but were the exaggeration of some fact. The dragon formed a part of all mythology, and, furthermore, there were analogies to it in the animal world. The structure of the flying fish fitted it it for seizing its prey on the wing. A little lizard, known as the flying dragon, still exists, and there were traces of resemblance in the squirrel which can all but fly and the bat which can perfectly use its wings. In all these and other classes there were similarities. When we go back to the pterodactyle, the iguanodon, the hadrasaurus, an other extinct monsters, we find additional analogies which greatly strengthen the scientific probability of the existence of creatures nearly like the dragon of tradition. If its existence be scientifically possibile, it is more likely that the widespread belief in dragons should be based on truth than that their conception should be evolved out of the study of the clouds or other natural pheonomena.—Cincinnati Gazette.

Salt in Intermittent Fever.

The directions are to take a handful of powdered white salt, such as is used in kitchens, and roast it in a clean stove (new, if possible) with moderate heat till it becomes of a brown color, like that of roasted coffee. The dose for an adult is a soup-spoonful dissolved in a glass of warm water, taken at once. It should be stated that when the fever makes its appearance at intervals of two, three, or four days, the remedy should be taken fasting, on the morning of the day following the fever. To overcome the thirst excited by the salt, but a small quantity of water should be taken through a straw. During the forty-eight hours which followed the taking of the salt, the appetite should be satisfied with chicken or beef broth only; it is especially necessary at the time to observe a severe diet, and to avoid taking cold. The author asserts that during the eighteen years that he has used this method of treatment he has never been unsuccessful. The remedy is certainly harmless, and perhaps worthy of a trial. —French Medical Journal.

Full of Liquor and Wit.

Among the reminiscences of the bar of Cincinnati written for the Commercial [illegible] appeared the following:

There was once the end of an important and somewhat celebrated trial in Chancery before the court by a compromise of the litigated matter among all the parties. There were more than a half dozen lawyers engaged in this trial, and when it was all over an adjournment of the court and bar took place to the court and the bar of the old Lafayette hotel, on Main street opposite the court house, kept by one of the pioneers of this city, by the name of Zebulon Byington. One or two of the judges and the half dozen members of the bar concluded to have a right good time, and so they left the bar of the inn and took a room above stairs, duly arranged and prepared by mine host, all to themselves. Of the lawyers Judge B—t, then practicing, and not on the bench, was a boon companion, and he sat down with ease and dignity to the table of punch and good things. Of course, there was a feast of reason and a flow of soul, and a great filling and flow of bowl. The party, all of them, drank and drank, and they drunk, and after a while their chairs got too small and limited for some of them. They were discussing the Agrarian laws of ancient Rome, and, of course they became gregarious, and much spirited argument and debate ensued on the leveling results of these laws. Finally, Judge B—t attempted to rise from his limited seat and explain fully his attitude on the subject. "Gentlemen," obtruded he—" "gen-tle" (sotto voce to himself, and holding on to the chair as best he could,) "gently, gently, old b-o-y. But gentle-men—I object—I—I—I—am no—no—no—gregarian—nor gorgon! I"—Suddenly the chair slipped from his slippery and unhandy fingers, and the noble judge lay sprawling, spread out flat upon the floor. "By all the gods," exclaimed he, "spirit—level!—spirit—level!—by Jupiter! this is spirit level by all the Rum-an gods."

Making Lumber from Straw.

Mr. S. H. Hamilton, of Bushnell, Ill., has discovered a process for making hard-wood lumber out of common wheat straw, with all the effects of polish and finish which are obtainable on the hardest of black walnut and mahogany, at as little cost as clear pine lumber can be manufactured for. The process of manufacture, as explained by Mr. Hamilton, is as follows: Ordinary straw board, such as is manufactured at any paper mill, is used for the purpose. As many sheets are taken as are required to make the thickness of lumber desired. These sheets are passed through a chemical solution, which thoroughly softens up the fiber and completely saturates it. The whole is then passed through a succession of rollers, dried and hardened during the passage, as well as polished, and comes out of the other end of the machine, hard, dry lumber, ready for use. It is claimed that the chemical properties hardening in the fiber entirely prevent water-soaking, and render the lumber combustible only in very hot fire. The hardened finish on the outside also makes it impervious to water. The samples exhibited could hardly be told from hard-wood lumber, and in sawing the difference could not be detected. It is susceptible of a very high polish, and samples of imitation of marble, mahogany, etc., were shown which might deceive the most experienced eye. Not only does Mr. Hamilton claim a substitute for lumber in sash, doors and blinds and finishing stuff, but also as a substitute for black walnut and other woods in the manufacture of all kinds of fine furniture, coffins, etc., and also an excellent substitute for marble in marble-top tables, mantelpieces, bureaus, etc. He claims that it will not warp in the least.—Milling and Mechanical News.

A Romance in Real Life.

The neighboring county of Robertson has had a sensation in the return of one of her citizens, who was stolen twenty years ago. It reads like a romance. Years ago a Mr. Reaves, now of Robertson county, was living on the Missouri river, and while there his 2-year-old son, Newton, was stolen by the Sioux Indians, with whom he dwelt fifteen years before finding out that he was of white blood. For six years he tried to effect his escape, as also to rescue a little girl, stolen from Detroit, Mich., named Anna Ware. His efforts were crowned with success; and, after twenty years spent with the Indians, he found himself among his own race, but almost a stranger among them. He worked in Michigan four years, and during that time he told his strange history to a gentleman who had it published. Charles Hamilton, of Ohio, read it, and, happening to know the elder Reaves, wrote to him at once, stating his suspicions that the lost son was found. An interchange of letters, and Newton started for Kentucky, reaching here last month, after walking through from Michigan, which he did in twelve days, crossing the Ohio river at Ripley on a plank. Newton's Indian name was Polar Bear, and he yet speaks very broken English, and is a great curiosity in Kentucky.—Cynthiana (Ky.) Cor. St. Louis Globe.

THE gold production of Victoria, Australia, last year was only 755,754 ounces, being a falling off from 1877 of 44,000 ounces, or between 5 and 6 per cent. The decrease in the yield of the Victorian mines for a long series of years has been constant and considerable. In 1870, for example, the product was 1,222,798 ounces, which shows in the interval a diminution of 467,000 ounces, or more than one-third.

ABOUT HANNER.

There was a young lady named Hanner,
She had a nose like a bandanner;
 She teached in a school,
 An' she rid on a mule,
But she never could play on the pianner.

SWELL: "Oh, Robinson, I am not at all satisfied with these trousers." Shopkeeper: "Indeed, sir! Sorry to hear that. We made 'em to measure, too!" Swell: "Yaas. But, you see, I didn't want them to measure—I wanted them to wear!"

A GENTLEMAN traveling on a Hudson river steamer, one day at dinner was making way with a large pudding close by, when he was told by a servant that it was a dessert. "It matters not to me," said he: "I would eat it if it were a wilderness."

"BUT you know, pa," said the farmer's daughter, when he spoke to her about the addresses of his neighbor's son, —"you know, pa, that ma wants me to marry a man of culture." "So do I, my dear.—so do I; and there's no better culture in the country than agriculture.

COMPROMISE: Small boy at the top of a ladder, gazing rapturously into a tin pail hung at a safe height on the maple, "Oh, Jack, what a lot; can't you just give me one drink?" "Well, Joe, I haven't given any of the fellows any, but you can suck the spout!"

A WITTY lady was once told by a gentleman of her acquaintance that "he must have been born with a silver spoon in his mouth." She looked at him carefully, and, upon realizing the size of his mouth, replied: "I don't doubt it; but it must have been a soup-ladle."

THERE is a story that a man went into a Newburyport liquor store and called for two quarts of rum, professing that it was for the purpose of soaking some roots. After the delivery of the liquor the dealer inquired, "What roots?" "The roots of my tongue," said to man; but it was too late.

SOME wags last Friday encased the carcass of a horse in red flannel, set it afloat in the Ohio, just above Madison, Ind., and passed the word by wire down both banks of the river that Boyton was coming. Skiffs shot out for miles along the river as the dead steed drifted down, and at Madison the populace of the whole city crowded to the wharves. The "sell" was a success.

THIS is the latest story that is being told of Mr. Sothern's "playful eccentricity." He objects to his dog forming new accquaintances, so he fastens two very sharp needles to his nose, leaving the ends to project about an inch. When a strange dog rushes up to "shake noses" with him, he gets a thrust that sends him off howling, and the effect is such that Mr. Sothern's dog cannot get within gunshot of any other that knows how the trick works.

THE days are fast coming along when a man will go home to dinner and find that a paper-hanger has monopolized the dining-room with his boards and paste, and the entire female section of the house in a terrible state of excitement as to whether the figure of the paper runs up or down. He takes a cold potatoe in one hand and a soda cracker in the other, and sitting on the back doorstep, eats his dinner (?) in peace, all the time inventing new "cuss words" for house decorators in general.—New Haven Register.

"THERE'S no place like home, exclaimed a married man with a sigh of relief, as he threw down his hat, pulled off his coat and boots, slipped his feet into his slippers, and flung himself down on the sofa. As soon as he was comfortably settled, his loving wife ordered him to go out and get a pail of water, bring in a scuttle of coal, lock up the hen-house, feed the pigs, and split some wood for the morning. Then he angrily gathered himself together, spitefully kicked off his slippers, savagely drew on his boots, hastily climbed into his ulster, jammed his hat down over his eyes, and as he went out of the back door, he muttered, "There is no place like home."—Hackensack Republican.

MAKING A NEWSPAPER.

Mr. Bunby Tries to Explain to Mrs. B. the Inner Mysteries of a Printing Office.

[Albany Journal.]

It was an exceedingly cold night, and Mr. and Mrs. Bunby hugged the stove closely, he passing the time reading a paper and she sitting looking into the fire.

Without any preface whatever, she dropped the poker. With so much force did it strike the hearth that Mr. Bunby stopped his reading abruptly and looked over the top of his spectacles inquiringly.

Mrs. Bunby had a happy thought, quickly it was transmitted to Mr. B.

"John,' said she, "you remember some time ago you promised to tell me how newspapers are made.'

"Yes, yes; but some other time, love.'

"No, now, please, John.'

Again he tried to content her with a promise, but it was of no avail: she wanted to know then, just "how papers are put together.'

He hesitated. The longer he hesitated the more impatient she grew, and he felt it. Seeing that postponement was of no avail, he heaved a sigh, laid aside his paper, and reluctantly began to unravel for his wife's edification the "inner life of a newspaper.

"In the first place,' said he, "the copy is sent to the composing room—'

"Where does the copy come from?' she queried.

"From the editor and reporters, of course.'

"O, I see.'

"Then it is given to the type-setters—'

"What do they do, sit on it?'

"No, thunder no; they are the compositors who set it up.'

"Oh, they compose the copy and then set it up. But how does it sit?'

He drew another long sigh and calmly replied; "The editors compose the copy, then send it to the composition room and the type setters put in type.'

"What! the copy?'

"Yes; they set the types up so that they will read as the copy reads.'

"Oh, I see.'

A pause ensued.

'John,' said Mrs. Bunby, "you stoped at the compositors sitting the type. What do they set the type in?

"In a stick.'

"A stick! what kind of a stick?'

"O, a stick is a device that is just the width of the columns of the paper, and holds 17 lines of brevier.'

"And what is brevier?'

"A kind of type that is pleasing to the eye and easily read.'

"Oh, I see.'

"When the printers get a stick full,' he went on, "they empty—'

"Are the printers different from the compositors?'

"No,' he replied, a little out of temper, "they are one and the same.'

"Oh, I see.'

"When they get a stick full of type, as I was about to say, they empty it on a galley—'

"And in throwing it upon a galley dont it go all apart?'

"No; they lift it from the stick and place it gently, very gently, on a galley—'

"And what's a galley?'

"A long article made of brass in which the matter is proved—'

"What kind of matter, and how do they prove it?'

'Will you wait a moment? If so, I will try and explain—but give me time,' he said, nettled a little at her cross-examination.

"All right, go on.'

"Type, when it is set up, is called 'matter,' and when the first impression of it is taken, they call it—'

'Impression of what?'

"Oh, bother—the type! when it is first printed on the galley, that is called a proof, and they call it proving the matter.'

"Oh, I see. Does the galley print it?'

"No, the devil!'

"Oh, John!' she cried, in terms of reproach, "why will you use such words?'

"I was not swearing. The apprentice around a printing office is known as 'the devil!'

"Oh'

"The proof sheet which he makes, after going to the proof reader, is returned to the printers and the corrections are made.'

"Corrections made in what?'

"The matter my dear. It is then given to the foreman.'

"What, the proof?'

"No, the matter.'

"And what does he do with it?'

"Will you wait a minute?'

"The foreman takes the matter and places it in the form.'

"What kind of a form?'

"An iron chase, which, when it has all the news in it which is in type, and it is locked up, is called a form.'

"Locked up! How?'

"With quoins and side-sticks.'

"Sticks and coins—ha! ha! ha!—what kind of coins?'

"Not coins, but quoins—q-u-o-i-n-s.'

"And what are they?'

'Goodness gracious! any more questions? A quoin,' he resumed, 'is a small block, and is wedged in between the chase and side-sticks with a 'shooting-stick.'

"A shooting stick! How does it shoot?'

"Shoots the quoins into place with the aid of a mallet.'

She did not quite understand, but saw by the white of his eye that it would not be well to question him too much, so she bided her time, and he went on.

"Sometimes the matter is 'pied'—'

"How's that?'

"Why, when some type is knocked over or dropped on the floor it is useless, and is called by the fraternity 'pi'.'

He thought he had got through, but the irrepressible wife continued:

"Where do they make the form up?'

"On the stone,' was the rejoinder.

"What kind of a stone—a round one?

"No, a flat one—a piece of level marble.'

"Oh, I see'

People Want Proof.

There is no medicine perscribed by physicians, or sold by druggists, that carries such evidence of its success and superior virtue as Boschee's German Syrup for severe coughs, colds settled on the breast, consumption, or any disease of the throat and lungs. A proof of that fact is that any person afflicted can get a sample bottle for 10 cents, and try its superior effect before buying the regular size at 75 cents. It has lately been introduced in this country from Germany, and its wonderful cures are astonishing everyone that uses it. Three doses will relieve any case. Try it. Sold by C. H. Hoyt.

—MR. EDITOR—On looking over your valuable paper I found items from all parts of the county except this. Therefore I send you these few items.

—Roads very muddy.

—Everybody busy making sugar this week.

—The frogs greet us with their songs again.

—Adam Wolf and family will move from this place this week, to the farm east of town formerly occupied by Jefferson Hunter.

—Sam Andrews is a happy man—its a boy and weighes five pounds.

—Clark has just repaired his saw mill which is a great improvement. He is now ready to do first class sawing of all kinds. He is a good honest fellow and should be patronized.

PICK-WICK.

Inquisitiveness.

The man who wants to know about things. We have all seen him. Have all "been there," as they say in the beautiful West. A dear son of New England having plied a new-comer in the mining region of Nevada with every conceivable question as to why he visited the gold region, his hopes, means, prospects, etc., finally asked him if he had a family.

"Yes, Sir," was the reply, "I have a wife and six children, and I never saw one of them."

Then there was a brief silence, after which the bore commenced: "Was you ever blind, Sir?"

"No, Sir."

"Did you marry a widow?"

"No, Sir."

Another pause

"Did I understand you to say that you had a wife and six children living in New York, and had never seen one of them?"

"Fact."

"How can that be?"

"Why," was the reply, "one of them was born after I left!"

THE GENUINE

DR. C. McLANE'S

CELEBRATED

FOR THE CURE OF

Hepatitis, or Liver Complaint,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increases on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to, or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them a FAIR TRIAL.

For all bilious derangements, and as a simple purgative, they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Every box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

The genuine McLANE'S LIVER PILLS bear the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrappers.

Insist upon having the genuine DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa.; the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE

Is a monthly, 100-page Scrap Book of the cream of the World's Literature. Single copy, 20c. or $2 per year. An Oil Chromo (14x20 inches) of "Yosemite Valley," price, $5; "Black Sheep," a $1.50 book, in paper binding; "Christian Oakley's Mistake," a $1 book, in paper binding, and a sample copy of "Wood's Household Magazine"—all post-paid, for only 30 cents in money, or in one-cent postage stamps. Agents wanted. Most liberal terms, but nothing sent free. Address S. S. Wood, Tribune Building, New York City.

TUTT'S PILLS!

A NOTED DIVINE SAYS THEY ARE WORTH THEIR WEIGHT in GOLD

READ WHAT HE SAYS:

DR. TUTT:—Dear Sir: For ten years I have been a martyr to Dyspepsia, Constipation and Piles. Last Spring your Pills were recommended to me; I used them (but with little faith). I am now a well man, have good appetite, digestion perfect, regular stools, piles gone, and I have gained forty pounds solid flesh. They are worth their weight in gold.

REV. R. L. SIMPSON, Louisville, Ky.

A TORPID LIVER

is the fruitful source of many diseases, such as Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Costiveness, Dysentery, Bilious Fever, Ague and Fever, Jaundice, Piles, Rheumatism, Kidney Complaint, Colic, etc.

Tutt's Pills exert a powerful influence on the Liver, and will with certainty relieve that important organ from disease, and restore its normal functions.

The rapidity with which persons take on flesh, while under the influence of these pills, of itself indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system.

CONSTIPATION.

Only with regularity of the bowels can perfect health be enjoyed. When the constipation is of recent date, a single dose of TUTT'S PILLS will suffice, but if it has become habitual, one pill should be taken every night, gradually lessening the frequency of the dose until a regular daily movement is obtained, which will soon follow.

THE THEFT OF THE PRESIDENCY.

Names of the Men Who Have Been Rewarded by Hayes—A Shameful and Disgraceful Page in American History.

The New York Sun publishes, in tabular form, the names of the persons who actively participated in the theft of the presidency, with the rewards which they have received from the administration in the shape of official position, giving the designation of the office and the salary which attaches to it. This list embraces 96 names, and shows that Hayes has liberally rewarded out of the public purse the men who counted him in. The sum total which these 96 participators in the presidential steal receive from the Government annually in salaries is $350,000, so that in the four years which the fraudulent administration is in power there will be paid out of the public treasury the sum of $1,000,000 to the men who nullified the voice of the American people, and gave the highest office in their gift to the men whom they had defeated by a majority of a quarter of a million of votes. This is the sum which the country is forced to pay in hard cash as a reward to these men for assisting in the commission of the greatest crime of the age. In the list is not missing the name of a single rascal who made any conspicuous contribution to the fraud. They have each and all been remembered and rewarded by Mr. Hayes, the man who received the benefits and advantages that accrued from their crimes. The exhibit is a suggestive one, and discouraging to those who believe in popular government and desire to see the honor of the country maintained. It contains the shameful evidences and suggestions of the frauds and rascalities that were committed in the interest of a gasping, desperate radicalism. Fraud, perjury, forgery or political corruption are suggested by every line in it. The following shows how the visiting states men have fared at the hands of the de facto president:

Name.	Office.	Salary.
John Sherman	Secretary of treasury	$8,000
John M. Harlan	Justice supreme court	10,000
S. Matthews	Senator from Ohio	5,000
Jas. A. Garfield	Adm. cand for speaker	——
Eugene Hale	Offered P. M. gen'lship	——
E. V. Stoughton	Minister to Russia	17,500
John A. Kasson	Minister to Austria	12,000
J. R. Hawley	Com'r to Paris exposit'n	2,000
E. F. Noyes	Minister to France	17,500
Lew Wallace	Gov'r of New Mexico	[illegible]
John Coburn	Com'r Hot Springs	——

The last three on the list manipulated the political wires in Florida; the others in Louisiana. William M. Evarts and Samuel Shellabarger, who defended the fraud before the electoral commission, have also had their rewards. Mr. Evarts is secretary of state at a salary of $8,000, and Mr. Shellabarger is retained by Hayes and Sherman in a variety of ways profitable to himself. How the members of the Louisiana returning board, by whom 10,000 Democratic votes were thrown out, have been rewarded, is thus shown:

Name.	Office.	Salary
J. Madison Wells	Surveyor port of New Orleans	$1,500
Thos. C. Anderson	Deputy collector port New Orleans	3,000
L. M. Kenner	Deputy naval officer	2,500
G. Casanave	Brother of U. S. storekeeper New Orleans	1,460
Charles S. Abell	Insp'r custom house	2,600
York A. Woodward	Clerk custom house	1,800
W. M. Green	Clerk custom house	1,095
B. P. Blanchard	Clerk custom house	1,400
G. P. Davis	Clerk custom house	1,200
Charles Hill	Clerk custom house	1,400
George Grindley	clerk custom house	1,680
John Ray	Special agent treasury department and counsel for Mr. Sherman	2,500

Mr. Hayes has not stopped with the immediate perpetrators of the fraud by which he profited. Their relatives have also been provided for. Places have been found for the two promising sons of J. Madison Wells; one of them is drawing $1,095 per annum, and the other $2,580 per annum in the New Orleans custom house; while F. A. Woolfley, an affidavit maker, has been appointed United States commissioner, and R. M. J. Kenner, a brother of Returning Board Kenner, is a clerk in the naval office. The State electors of president and vice president have been given the following offices:

Name.	Office.	Salary.
W. P. Kellogg	United States senator	$5,000
J. Henry Burch	State senator	600
Peter Joseph	Clerk custom house	1,200
M. A. Sheldon	Counsel for J. Sherman	——
Morris Marks	Collector Int. rev	2,650
A. B. Levisee	Special agt. treasury department	2,500
O. H. Brewster	Surveyor general	1,800

The State officers and managers in Louisiana have been rewarded as follows:

Name.	Office.	Salary.
Michael Hahn	Superintendent mint	$1,000
A. J. Dumont	Inspector custom house	——
J. F. McArdle	Clerk custom house	1,200
W. P. Kellogg	United States Senate	5,000
L. J. Souer	Appraiser custom house	3,000
W. G. Lane	U. S. com. cir. court, La.	Fees
S. B. Packard	Consul to Liverpool	6,000
Geo. L. Smith	Collector New Orleans	7,000
James Lewis	Naval officer	[illegible]
Jack Wharton	United States marshal	6,000
A. S. Badger	P. M. [illegible], now collector	7,00
M. S. Campbell	U. S. att'y, Wyoming	3,000

W. F. Loan	Insp. tobacco int. rev.	1,400
W. L. McMillen	Pen. agt. N. O., now P. M.	4,000

And the various supervisors, sheriffs, republican managers and tools of the party connected with the canvass and election in Louisiana have been provided with places as shown in the following table;

Name.	Office.	Salary
M. J. Grady	Dep. col. int. revenue	$1,000
J. H. Dinkgrave	Legislature	……
H. C. C. Ashwood	Dep. U S marshal	Fees
W. R. Hardy	Inspector custom house	1,095

M. A. Lenet	Laborer custom house	600
Victor Gerodias	Tax collector, N. O.	Fees
A. J. Brim	Inspector custom house	1,095
Patrick Creagh	Chief laborer	1,000
R. C. Howard	Laborer custom house	600
J. C. Peuchler	Laborer custom house	600
W J Meers	Gauger internal rev	Fees
Thomas Leon	Gauger custom house	……
T H Rowan	N'ht insp. cust'm house	900
A W Kempton	Ast. weigh'r custom h'se	1,200
L Backus	Police	900
M Underwood	Insp. internal revenue	1,200
P J Maloney	Inspector custom house	1,095
L E Salles	weigher custom house	2,000
R A Herbert	Supt. warehouses, custom house	2,500
W B Dickey	Inspector custom house	1,095
Thomas Jenks	Clerk mint	1,000

The South Carolina and Florida thieves were also not forgotten while Hayes was dealing out his rewards, as the following table of Florida election officials in office goes to show:

Name.	Office.	Salary.
M L Stearns	Com'nrs Hot Spring	$5,000
F C Humphries	Collector Pensacola	2,000
S B McLin	Assistant Justice New Mexico (not confirmed)	3,000
Moses J Taylor	Clerk United States land office	1,200
Joseph Bowes	Clerk treasury dep'tm't	720
W K Cessna	Postmaster	2,500
R H Black	Phil'a custom house	900
Dr. Leon	Cl'k in treasury de'pt	1,200

With these tables before the country, it is not necessary for much argument to be made to convince the people that these Southern returning boards were for sale, and were duly purchased in Mr. Hayes' interest and at the expense of the National treasury.

St Joe.

—Mud drying up.

—New sidewalk on Main street.

—Gus., the blacksmith, has the foundation laid for a new shop.

—Newville's tonsorial artist, now located at Spencerville, passed through St. Joe a few days ago, enroute for his new field of labor.

—C. H. Jenkins, who for the past two years has been living near Kings' Corners, has pulled up stakes and moved south. Good-bye, Charley.

—Since our announcement of Dr. White's remedies, the doctor has been overrun with patients wanting the remedy. The Dr. is overwhelmed with business, and would like his customers to call early to avoid the rush.

—We understand that a certain party living in the city, offered $100 to any person who would give him the name of the author of the St. Joe items. He claims that his character was injured by our advertising his mill a few weeks ago, which has not put in an appearance yet, nor is it likely to. If the gentleman does not wish to be advertised he must quit bragging. It is our business to look up the enterprises of the town, and when we advertise the above gentleman, we do no more for him than we would do for any one else. We presume, by calling at the post office in town, the gentleman can be accommodated with the name of the writer, as Jake and Mel are of an obliging turn.

—We learn that Young has sold his interest to Leighty & Wineland who will put up a mill and have it in running trim in a few days. Success to you, gentlemen.

—The citizens of Orange were quite surprised on Tuesday by the appearance of the Sodom congregation on the banks of the river. It was amusing to see the citizens coming from all directions, and some on the run, to see, as they supposed, some one taken from a watery grave. It turned out that the Dunkard congregation of Sodom had met to administer the rite of baptism to some of its communicants. Three persons were immersed according to the rules of said church.

DOXIE.

North and South.

[State Sentinel.]

To be forever arraying the north against the south is something far worse than folly, worse than a mistake. It is a crime, malicious in all of its elements, fiendish in its purposes, and can only be calamitous in its results. The republican party, when in power, by pursuing a patriotic course toward the south, could long ere this have had among its followers the brains and influence of a large portion of southern statesmen and people. It chose to perpetuate the war spirit after the war was over. It preferred everlasting contention to peace and good will. It fanned the fires of hate, and strove by every infernal device to keep the Union severed after the Union had been restored. The evidence is piled mountain high, that the great mass of the southern people accepted the result of the war as a finality upon every question involved in the struggle, and went to work with a high resolve to rebuild their waste places and retrieve their wrecked fortunes. This noble ambition was never appreciated by the leaders of the republican party, and now, 17 years after the bloody strife has ceased, they are at work with the malignity of devils to beat back prosperity in the south, to re-open every war question, and re-enthrone anarchy. The south simply desires that all its rights under the constitution shall be accorded, and that its representatives shall be regarded on the floors of congress as the peers of northern constituencies. The south is solid upon these propositions, and nothing else. As an evidence that the southern heart beats responsive to every noble and generous sentiment, to every feeling of good will and to every magnanimous deed, it is only necessary to recall the acknowledgments of southern men of the active goodness of the north in the time of the south's great affliction last year. At a meeting held by southern senators and representatives, where such men as Eustis, of Louisiana; Lamar, of Mississippi; Harris, of Tennessee; Garland, of Arkansas; Manning, of Mississippi; and Goode, of Virginia; took part, all leading representative men, a resolution was adopted which ought forever to silence the voice of republican conspirators:

It declared that the great and munificent charity manifested toward us and our people by our brethren of the northern states of the Union has not only healed the sick, fed the hungry, clothed the naked, solaced the dying, given hope and comfort to the widow and orphan and buried the dead. It has accomplished a work far higher and more important. It has healed the wounds of war; it has served to permit us to see our bretheren of the American Union as they really are; it has bound our hearts to theirs; it has cemented anew the bonds between them and us; it has renewed the aspirations of all of our people toward the idea of an American Union based upon affection. To-day, far above the victorious flag of Appomatox floats the banner of love and charity. Better, brighter and far more enduring are the victories of love and mercy over those of war, conquest and subjugation; and now, with the shadows and the sorrows of our chastisements upon us, and with hearts all full to overflowing with the memories of the good and kindly deeds of our brethren of the northern states, done to our people in the hours when they stood face to face with the awful pestilence, we ask our brethren of the north to believe, and to trust us while we pledge to them the undying fealty of our hearts to the constitution of our common country, and the perpetual Union of the state thereunder—not only the physical, geographical and political Union, but a union of affection, of brotherhood, inspired by the idea of a common origin and a common destiny, ratified by the covenant of our fathers, and now cemented forever by their love and their charity to us and our people.

What more could be said; and fortunately for the south and the whole country, no act of the south gives the lie to the sentiments of fellowship and good-will expressed. The people of the north are determined that the south shall no longer be oppressed with republican war measures, and no amount of "bloody-shirt" literature will change the verdict.

CHILLICOTHE, O., Mar. 29, 1879.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER:—As the Democratic State Central Committee are to meet at Columbus on the 28th prox, for the purpose of fixing upon the time and place for holding the State Convention, would a friendly suggestion from one who has acted with the National party from its birth to the present be taken unkindly by the Committee? If not, I would feel like suggesting that the time and place be fixed for June 4th, at Columbus, the day and place upon which the Nationals hold their Convention. Friendly intercommunication between the two would determine whether or not harmony of action as well as harmony of doctrines may not be agreed upon, so as to unite in a common effort the friends of financial reform. The campaign of last year is suggestive, and ought to satisfy the most incredulous of the axiomatic truth that a house divided against itself can not stand, but must fall. The Ohio idea, as it is called, of the Democratic party of Ohio and of one or two other States, is the idea of financial reform of the National party throughout the entire nation. Then why not in Ohio, as in Michigan, make common cause and fight the great battle together, for the common defence against the unwarranted encroachments of the Money Power, and the evident tendency of the dominant party to subvert the Government from a democracy to an aristocracy? Every consideration of patriotism and of humanity call upon us to make the effort. The combined vote last year of the Democratic and National parties of Ohio gave to the Ohio idea a majority of over thirty-five thousand votes, of which the Nationals cast nearly thirty-nine thousand, and yet John Sherman and his coadjutors claimed that the Ohio idea was then dead—had been killed by the miserable little plurality of the Republican party over the democratic vote. It can hardly be expected that either party will disband or surrender in any manner, principles, honor or organization, nor is it at all necessary in this State to do either, for with the Ohio idea as the platform for both, the only question between them would be that of acceptable candidates to both. The Nationals want candidates who can be fully trusted upon this issue, and will take no risk in that regard. The Democratic party profess the Ohio Idea as strongly as do the Nationals, and, of course, could not well object to the nomination of men known to be honest representatives of the Ohio idea. General Morgan or Ewing would give sufficient guaranty of the earnestness of the party to the cause, and would justify the hope that the nomination of either would be acceptable to both parties, and, as in Michigan, so in Ohio, let the same candidates be common to both tickets, and be representative men upon the principles of the Ohio idea. With such an arrangement as this, which would certainly be honorable, as well as politic, a sweeping victory is assured at the October election, which will do honor to our noble State and to the cause which both profess. It is hoped these suggestions may have the effect at least to cause some consideration of their merit and to pave the way for such action beween the parties as may tend to unite and harmonize all who favor the Ohio Idea, all who would have our famishing industries revived, who would make the public weal the highest consideration of public polity, and who would have principles of right, justice and humanity instilled into our laws for the government of all, irrespective of section or class. Respectfully. J. I. THROCKMORTON.

Troy.

—There are a couple of boys about 16 years old who go to the U. B. church, that don't know how to conduct themselves any more than a donkey would at a spelling bee. Better be careful boys, the sexton has an eye on you.

—Jacob McDonald and Isaac Searfoss are going to start for Kansas just as soon as the roads get good.

—Frank Fink and Ada Ackerman got tired working in sigle harness, so they went through all that snow storm on last Thursday, and had O. P. Learned, Esq., to hitch them together. We wish them joy and prosperity.

—The Tamarac school closes next Monday evening with an exhibition which, judging from the preparations that are being made, is going to be a grand one.

—There is a young man in Troy township who told a confidential friend of his that he "would have been married six weeks ago, if he could have got enough money to get some clothes." Go in debt for them, Hank. We think all you need in this world is a woman.

Kansas Letter.

EDITORS COURIER,—As a former resident of Auburn, I would like a small space in your columns. I have been a resident of Kansas eighteen months, and think I can tell something of the country that may be of advantage to the readers of the COURIER. In our county, (Reno,) one of the best in the state, the soil is good, a dark sandy loam and very productive. We can grow almost any kind of produce. I often think of the hard way of DeKalb county farmers; you have many people with small means that should come west and get a farm, although the immigration is large this spring, yet there is room for more. Hutchinson, the county seat of Reno, is full of imigrants seeking homes in the new country. This county has no timber, and coal has not yet been found. We pay six dollars per ton for coal. The county is well watered with the Arkansas river and many small streams. Forest timber grows well here and nearly all kinds do well. Fruit trees grow lively—we have a good prospect for a large peach crop, apple trees are not old enough to bear yet. The climate is very healthy; the winter that has just past was rather severe for this country, but now grass and wheat are growing, and some corn has been planted.

Indiana Diamonds.

[South Bend (Ind.) Tribune.]

Mr. J. D. Mast, formerly an Omish preacher, has been creating considerable excitement in Liberty township by his actions. He came to the residence of Mr. J. D. Row one day last week, and, whipping out his divining rod, astonished Mr. Row by telling him that there were diamonds on his farm, and finally located the exact position of them, a few feet down in a spot of ground not far from his residence, and near the main road. Mr. Row failed to be convinced, and refused to dig at the spot indicated, although he gave Mr. Mast permission to do so. Mast dug down the distance indicated, and shortly after showed to Mr. Row a substance which he called diamond, and claimed that it was worth $2,000. It was a clear crystal, and cut glass as readily as a diamond would. Mr. Row allowed Mast to take the alleged diamond away, for, as he said, "If that is a diamond, I threw up millions of dollars worth of them when I dug my cellar last summer." He thinks it is a peculiar kind of quartz, something like the crystals found in geodes. At any rate they are so abundant as to be not even curiosities. Besides "Mast's diamonds," he has with his divining-rod located two coal-beds in this county and three in Marshall. More than that, he has located a box of treasure on a certain farm between this place and North Liberty, which is not to be dug for except a certain night in next June. It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to say that there are few who believe in the vagaries of Mast and his divining-rod while there are some who have perfect faith in them.

POLITICAL.

THE Ohio Democratic Committee have decided to hold the State Convention at Columbus, June 4.

THE Greenback-Labor party of Rhode Island held its State Convention at Providence last week, and nominated candidates for State officers, headed by Samuel Hill, for Governor.

DR. LUKE P. BLACKBURN, made famous by his work in behalf of the yellow-fever sufferers of the South, is to be rewarded for his labors by the Governorship of Kentucky. Half the delegates to the Democratic State Convention are instructed for him.

REPRESENTATIVE GARFIELD expresses the opinion that the session of Congress will last all summer. He is making his arrangements with that expectation. So says a Washington correspondent.

AT the municipal election in Chicago, last week, the entire Democratic ticket, headed by ex-Congressman Carter H. Harrison, for Mayor, was elected by about 5,000 majority. The Socialists polled about 12,000 votes, and elected three members of the City Council. In the new Council there will be seventeen Democrats, 13 Republicans and 4 Socialists. In Milwaukee, Madison, Janesville and Beloit, Wis., the Republicans carried the day, while the Democrats were successful at Fond du Lac and La Crosse.

RHODE ISLAND has re-elected her present State officers, all Republicans. The vote was light. Van Zandt, Republican, for Governor, received 9,609; Segar, Democrat, 5,807; Hill, Greenback, and scattering, 377; majority, 3,885. The General Assembly comprises in the Senate 28 Republicans, 8 Democrats, 2 no choice, and in the House 52 Republicans, 15 Democrats, and 4 no choice....The election in Wisconsin for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court resulted in the choice of Judge Cole (Republican), present incumbent, by about 10,000 majority.

GENERAL.

RECENT deaths: Ex-Congressman William S. Abert, of Baltimore, Md.; Ex-Congressman James K. Gibson, of Abingdon, Va.; Ex-Mayor W. H. C. Johnston, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

BURNED: The Belmont Oil Works, at Philadelphia, loss $100,000. Trimfer's Wadding Mill, at Niverville, N. Y., loss $70,000; sixteen houses at Lebanon, Ky., loss $50,000.

THE report of the board of officers who have been investigating the case of Gen. Fitz-John Porter has been given to the public. It not only vindicates Porter, but implies in its language a condemnation of the men who degraded him. It is declared that Porter exercised on the 27th of August, 1862, the "very ordinary discretion of a corps commander," and did his "plain duty;" while on the 29th of August, says the report, "Gen. Porter's duty was too plain and simple to admit of discussion, and the board is unable to find anything in it subject to criticism, much less deserving of censure or condemnation."

FOREIGN.

IT is reported in London that an alliance against England is about to be formed between China and Burmah....M. Tenaille de Vaulabelle, the French historian, is dead.

GEN. GRANT has accepted an invitation from the King of Siam to visit that country....Advices from Brazil state that the mortality in that country from disease and famine continues to be frightfully large.

The disastrous opening of the Zulu war causes great discontent in England. There is just enough feeling in the country in favor of peace to make unsuccessful wars very unpopular....Germany has modified her blockade of the Russian frontier against the plague, which has produced so much ill-feeling at St. Petersburg....The King of Italy has commuted the sentence of Passanante, his would-be assassin, from death to life-imprisonment....Germany approves of the joint occupation of Roumelia, but declines to furnish troops. France has not yet taken action. Austria, Italy, Russia, and England have agreed to furnish a contingent.

FORTY-FIVE persons were arrested in St. Petersburg the night after the attempt on the life of Gen. Von Drentalin, Chief of the Gendarmerie. Some were of such high rank that they were not sent to common prisons. They include officers of the Guard, Court Chamberlains and two daughters of a prominent Minister....Advices from Afghanistan report that 2,000 Afghans attacked a small detachment of British in Pishin valley and were defeated with a loss of sixty killed. There were no casualties among the British.

A BATTALION of French soldiers were recently overtaken by a snow-storm in Algeria, and nineteen of them were frozen to death.

WHILE crossing the Cabul river, near Jellalabad, in Afghanistan, a squadron of British hussars were carried away by the current. About forty soldiers were lost.

THE surgeons have painlessly extracted the grains of powder which remained in the German Emperor's head since Nobeling's attempt on his life....The defeat of 5,000 Afghans, with a loss of 400 killed, by the British under Capt. Gough, is cabled from Lahore, India. The British lost three officers and three men killed, and a number were wounded;... The Russian soldiers are rapidly evacuating Turkish territory.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Senate was not in session on the 28th ult.—In the House, Mr. Springer presented the memorial of J. J. Wilson, claiming to be elected from the Ninth Congressional district of Iowa on the 5th of November, and offered a resolution to refer the memorial to the Committee on Elections when appointed. All the sitting members from Iowa were elected on the day claimed on the other side, but not on the day legally fixed for the election. The resolution was adopted. The Army bill was taken up. The consideration of the bill having been concluded, with the exception of section 6, repealing the statutes allowing the military to preserve the peace at the polls, that section was read. A long debate ensued, but no vote was reached.—About thirty members of the House, including Reagan, Jones (Texas), Springer, Stevenson, Ewing, Murch, Ladd, Kelley, De la Matyr, Weaver, Warner, Wright and Wise, met in the evening to consider the subject of the presentation of financial measures at the present session. After a general interchange of views, the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, That we will ask the co-operation of our fellow-members of all parties in endeavoring to pass at this session bills for the following purposes: First, to increase the coinage of silver to the capacity of our mints, and to issue certificates receivable for all public dues, and the purchase of silver bullion at market rates. Second, to reissue the greenbacks now held for the redemption of fractional currency or hereafter retired for the payment of arrears of pension and in extinguishment of the bonded debt. Third, providing for the substitution of legal-tender notes for national-bank notes. Fourth, to stop all further increase of the national debt. Fifth, to provide for a tax on incomes of over $2,000."

The amendment to the Appropriation bill forbidding the use of troops at the polls gave rise to a warm partisan debate in the House on the 29th ult. Mr. Stephens argued that public sentiment, North and South, was against the employment of troops at the polls. There was no need of such a thing. The country had got along without it for three-quarters of a century. There would be no harm done, therefore, by a repeal of the law. Mr. Garfield argued against the policy of the Democratic party in Congress, declaring it to be utterly revolutionary and tending to the subversion of the Government. "We pick up the gage of battle which you have thrown down, and will appeal to our common sovereign—the people—to say whether you shall break down the principle of free consent in legislation at the price of starving the Government to death. We are ready to pass these bills for the support of the Government at any time when you will offer them in the ordinary way, and, if you offer these other measures as separate measures, we will meet you in the spirit of fair and fraternal debate. But you shall not compel us; you shall not coerce us, even to move this Government, until the question has gone to the sovereigns to determine whether they will consent to break down any of its voluntary powers, and on that ground we plant ourselves." Mr. McMahon said it came with ill grace from any Republican to say that the provision was improper because it was put upon an appropriation bill. The Republicans themselves had passed many measures in the same way. It had never been considered revolutionary, but, on the contrary, as a protection against arbitrary power to attach legislation to an appropriation bill. The Democrats wanted the jury-box purified, the use of troops at the polls prohibited, and the repeal of that most infamous of all measures which put it in the power of Marshals and their deputies to corrupt the ballot-box and intimidate voters.

VERY LITTLE business was done by Congress on the 31st ult. The House was not in session, and the Senate held a very brief session. Mr. Grover introduced a bill extending the time for the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad; Mr. Johnston introduced a bill to authorize the National Board of Health to investigate and report on the infectious and contagious diseases of animals; and Mr. Windom offered a bill to repeal so much of the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, as authorizes the Secretary of War to release the Moline Water-Works, Rock Island, Ill.

After a brief discussion, the Senate, on the 1st inst., passed the bill appropriating $200,000 to construct a refrigerating ship, to be used in disinfecting yellow-fever ships.——In the House, Mr. Atkins reported the Legislative Appropriation bill, containing clauses repealing and amending sections of the Revised Statutes relating to drawing jurors, the jurors' test-oath, Deputy Marshals and Supervisors of Election. The debate on the Army bill was resumed, and several fiery speeches were made.

Various bills were introduced in the Senate on the 2d ult., among them one, by Mr. Harris, providing for a treaty with Mexico. Mr. Hoar's resolution condemning as unconstitutional and revolutionary the Democratic programme of legislation was laid on the table—yeas, 35; nays, 20. Mr. Saulsbury, of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, made a report against the admission of Mr. Bell as a Senator from New Hampshire on the appointment of the Governor. It will come up for consideration to-morrow. Mr. Hoar presented the views of the minority of the committee in favor of admitting Bell, signed by himself, Cameron (Wis.) and Ingalls.——The House continued the discussion of the Army bill. Speeches were delivered by Messrs. Williams (Wis.), Townshend, Calkins, Herbert, Finister, White (Pa.) and Buckner. The Senate, in executive session, confirmed Andrew D. White as Minister to Berlin, and Dr. Cornelius A. Logan, a cousin of Senator Logan, as Minister to Central America.——The Greenback members of the House held a caucus, at which it was decided that they would move to strike out the political amendments from the Appropriation bills; this motion failing, they would decline to vote, and leave the Democrats and Republicans to fight it out between themselves.

The Senate transacted no business on the 3d inst. The New Hampshire Senatorship case was discussed briefly, there was a short executive session, and an adjournment to the 7th.——In the House, the discussion of the amendment to the Army bill forbidding the use of troops at the polls was continued. Mr. Knott, of Kentucky, led off, on the Democratic side, and spoke of the great and historical importance of the principle involved. He characterized it as the great fundamental principle of republican liberty, that the ballot-box should be protected from the slightest approach to military power, and that the voter shall be left absolutely free in exercising at the polls the highest prerogative of the citizen. He quoted the English statute of George II. for the removal of troops from the places where an election is to be held, and cited Blackstone, "That it is essential that elections shall be absolutely free, and that, therefore, all undue influences are illegal and are prohibited." He was followed, on the Republican side, by Mr. Houck, who argued that it was absolutely necessary for the protection of the lives and political rights of the colored and white Republicans of the South that the authority of the military to preserve the peace at the polls should be maintained. This speech, being by a Southern man, attracted much attention, and was frequently applauded on the Republican side, and jeered on the Democratic side. Mr. Robeson (Republican) followed. He confined himself to the questions of law involved in the discussion, and said it is proposed here to restrain the civil officers of the United States from keeping the peace at any election in any State. By what means? By civil means, not by military means, for the right of the civil officer, the Marshal of the district, if you please, to summon a posse comitatus is a right to summon the ordinary military companies that may be within the body of his bailiwick. The right to summon armed troops, if they be within the body of his bailiwick, is a civil, not a military right, and is in the interest of the inviolability and strength of civil law. Mr. Blackburn (Democrat) spoke next. He said he was but a poor student of his country's history who was not able to satisfy himself that from the foundation of the constitution down to the present time it had ever been held (and that by the highest authorities in the land) that it was in the power of the House to control the employment of the army by withholding supplies. In the very nature of things the proposed repeal could not be revolutionary. The constitution did not give the right to the President to send armed forces into any State, even to suppress domestic violence. Other speeches were made by Messrs. Gibson, Turner, Barber, Hawk and Reagan.

THE ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

RESUME OF THE EVIDENCE TAKEN BY SENATOR WALLACE'S COMMITTEE.

A Mr. Baker testified that no person in the Treasury Department receiving less than $1,200 per year was asked to subscribe to the Republican campaign fund. R. B. Squiers testified that he was an assistant messenger in the War Department. He did not subscribe anything. Soon after receiving the circular his salary was reduced to $60 per month. His salary was reduced at the beginning of the fiscal year by action of Congress at the same time that other employes were cut down.

THE PHILADELPHIA BRANCH.

A sub-committee of the Wallace-Teller Investigating Committee, consisting of Senators Wallace (Pa.), Garland (Ark.), McDonald (Ind.), Hoar (Mass.) and Cameron (Wis.) have been examining witnesses at Philadelphia. R. C. Howell, of the Eighteenth ward, testified that Deputy Marshal Charles Oliphant was drunk on election day, and insulted every Democrat that came to the polls to vote. His testimony was corroborated by other witnesses, who also testified that Oliphant used every means to drive away Democratic voters.

John Warner, of the Twenty-ninth ward, testified that Thomas Herr, the United States Marshal in this ward, had a bad reputation. He arrested a man for trying to vote, notwithstanding that parties were ready to vouch for him. Arthur Vance, of the Fifteenth ward, a United States Marshal, was also charged with intimidating voters.

A Board of Three Equally Divided.

During the Rebellion the Law School at Cambridge was presided over by Profs. Parsons, Parker, and Washburn. They were divided in their political views, and each did his best to maintain his opinion. Prof. Parker was one day asked: "How do you get along on politics at the Law School?" "Nicely," he answered; "we are equally divided." "But how can that be," continued the inquirer; "there are three of you?" "Easy enough," replied the professor; "Parsons writes on one side and I on the other, and Washburn—he speaks on one side and votes on the other."—Boston Transcript.

A New York lady, who was passing the winter in Florence, recently gave a grand ball which was attended by a very large and distinguished company. A surprise figure in the cotillion excited much sensation by its novelty. A large tree was brought in, from which were hung paper baskets, that on being pulled divided into halves and gave escape to numbers of little birds that flew about the ball-room until let out of the window or rescued by some fair hand to be taken home and cared for.

A RECENT census shows that Portland, Ore., has 17,225 inhabitants, and that 1,882 are Chinese.

BROOKS—BURLINGAME.

Reminiscences of One of the Most Exciting Events That Ever Transpired in the American Congress.

[From Richmond (Ind.) Telegram.]

The following letter from the Hon. L. D. Campbell with regard to the most exciting event in Congress that immediately preceded the War of the Rebellion has been received by Mr. Robert O. Dormer, of this city, in response to a request for the particulars of the affair. The letter was not intended for publication, but, in view of its historic value, Mr. D. has permitted us to put it in print:

HAMILTON, Ohio, March 5, 1879.

R. O. Dormer, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 1st inst. I am the only living man who knows all about the Brooks-Burlingame affair, about which you make inquiry. * * *

You are clearly in error in regard to the matter. It occurred in those stormy days, a quarter of a century ago, when knock-downs, the drawing of bowie-knives and pistols were not infrequent in the halls of Congress, and duels and rumors of duels in Washington.

Senator Butler, of South Carolina, was Brooks' uncle. He was a very aged man, tottering over the grave. He had been stricken with paralysis, and trembled like an aspen leaf. Sumner, in making a very aggressive anti-slavery speech in the Senate, assailed Butler and referred to his weakness. Sumner was then 45 years of age, fully six feet high, well proportioned, and a fine specimen of physical development. Brooks, the nephew, looked for Sumner on the avenue to chastise him. Failing to find him, he went to the Senate Chamber, after the body had adjourned, and there beat Sumner over the head with a gutta-percha cane fearfully. I arrived in the Chamber soon after, washed the blood off Sumner, and brought him to consciousness. I also requested the surgeon to sew up his scalp-wounds and take him to his boarding-house.

The next day (being Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee) I offered a resolution for an investigation, and was appointed Chairman of the committee. Subsequently, as Chairman, I reported a resolution to expel Brooks, which was carried. Brooks was re-elected and came back to the House of Representatives.

Some months afterward Burlingame made a carefully-prepared speech in which he referred to Brooks, saying: "He stole into the Senate Chamber in a cowardly way, and there smote the Senator from Massachusetts as Cain smote his brother."

There was then a challenge expected, of course. However, friends interfered, and some explanations were made on Burlingame's part, which were accepted by Brooks' friends, and published. Thereupon the New England press commented severely on Burlingame's concessions, and charged him with showing the white feather. These things stung him to the quick. Then for the first time he came to me for counsel. I told him if he did not really mean what he said in his speech he ought to take it back unequivocally; if he did mean it, he could afford to say so, and accept the consequences. He came out in a card in the National Intelligencer saying, in substance, that he maintained what he had said in his speech. This speedily brought what was in substance a challenge.

It was not delivered by Keitt, as you suppose, but by Gen. Jo Lane, of Mexican war fame, then the delegate from Oregon. It simply invited Burlingame out of the District of Columbia to settle the affair. This, of course, meant a challenge, and was so worded to evade the law of Congress. Burlingame again pressed me into his service. I wrote the reply and delivered it to Gen. Lane. He called on me to name the place outside of the District. I named the "Clifton House, on the Canada side of the Niagara falls, and the following Tuesday morning at 6 o'clock," for the meeting. I sent Burlingame to New York the same night to prevent his arrest.

Two days after this Lane came out in the papers objecting to the "Clifton House," because it was in the North, and he did not intend to take Brooks "through the enemy's country." I replied that, being called upon to name a place outside of the District, I was not fool enough to name "Richmond or Charleston," and take my friend through his "enemy's country." Brooks was arrested and put under bonds. I telegraphed Burlingame to return. He did so. He, too, was arrested and put under bonds—myself his surety. Burlingame immediately left for the West.

Soon afterward Brooks and Lane, and their friends, discovered that it was regarded among duelists as a let-down on their part, and that Burlingame's record was all right. Lane wrote me a threatening letter, asking me to open up the correspondence, and saying that unless I informed them where a letter would reach Mr. Burlingame by the next Tuesday they would make expose, etc. To that I promptly replied, in substance, that Burlingame had gone West, and if they wanted him to go and hunt him—that if they hankered for my blood they need not wait till Tuesday, and that they might "hurry up the cakes!" that I was on hand, etc. This ended the correspondence.

I will simply add that it was well known to members of Congress from the South and from the North that I was the best shot, both with rifle and with pistol, there was in the body. There seemed to be a prevailing opinion, too, that I would fight if called on. This was, perhaps because I had more cheek than most members. You know that cheek is often mistaken for courage. Whether it is so in my case, I am not a proper judge. I never received but one challenge for a duel, and that party soon found a reason to withdraw it when he learned from a Southern friend that I meant business.

Although differing widely in politics at that time, Brooks was my warm personal friend, and died so. So was Gen. Lane.

The popular opinion that Brooks was a coward is far from correct. He was sensitive and impetuous, but had many excellent traits of character. In haste. Very truly yours,

LEWIS D. CAMPBELL.

The Vanderbilt Will Case.

The decision of Surrogate Calvin in the contest of the will of Commodore Vanderbilt was rendered yesterday, confirming in all things the probate of the will and codicils. The Surrogate's opinion is long and exhaustive, filling about 150 pages of legal cap, covering in some form all the issues and questions of any importance that have arisen during the progress of the trial. The testimony of each of the witnesses, of whom there were more than 100, is summarized. The testimony is then divided into eight heads, and each of these subdivisions is considered in order. The Surrogate thinks that the testimony of the contestant's medical experts raised a stronger presumption that they were themselves irrational than that the Commodore was of unsound mind. The testimony of the proponent's experts shows, to the Surrogate's mind, that the deductions to be drawn from the autopsy were of little or no significance. After considering the testimony as to monomania, the Surrogate finds that it shows the Commodore to have been a man of vigorous mind and strong nature, but lacking the amenities of education and culture, and a delicate respect for the opinions of his fellow-men. He endeavors to disprove the possibility that William H. Vanderbilt could have exerted an undue influence upon his father. He urges those interested to "bring to merited punishment" the principal spiritualistic witnesses, "together with their guilty suborners." The contestant is censured for the aspersions cast upon the character of Mrs. Vanderbilt, the Surrogate considering the "tardy apology" at the close a sorry amend. The opinion concludes with an expression of satisfaction that the record should have been preserved so clean—in spite of all the efforts to tarnish it.

Postal Rank of the Several States.

In the recent readjustment of post-offices and salaries of Postmasters, graded upward according to business done and stamps used, 145 were added to what are called Presidential offices—an office becoming Presidential when the receipts are sufficient to entitle the Postmaster to a salary of $1,000 or more. In the recent readjustment and addition of 145 to the list, it was a matter of comment at the Postoffice Department that so few went to the Southern States, and so many to the Western and Northwestern States, indicating, along with many other things, that the path of empire is trending Westwardly with great rapidity. Postoffice officials think that the postal business, receipts from sale of stamps, etc., is a fair indication of the business, commercial and intellectual growth of particular States and sections. The old Southern States fall behind and the new Western States go far ahead, the fresh and vigorous State of Iowa having nearly four times as many as the old State of Virginia. Illinois occupies the second place on the list, and Massachusetts the fifth place, and Georgia, the Empire State of the South, falls behind other Southern States of less pretense. The following is a list in full of the number of Presidential offices in each State:

New York	178	Virginia	25
Illinois	152	New Hampshire	23
Pennsylvania	126	Georgia	21
Ohio	110	Vermont	19
Massachusetts	108	Tennessee	17
Iowa	95	Nebraska	17
Michigan	71	Alabama	16
Indiana	60	Mississippi	16
Wisconsin	58	Maryland	13
New Jersey	50	Colorado	13
Connecticut	45	North Carolina	11
California	42	South Carolina	11
Missouri	42	Rhode Island	11

The Patent Buffer.

It was a reporter on a live daily who had glued his lynx eye to the keyhole of a Baldwin Hotel room the other day, when he was disgusted to find, on looking up, that the occupant of the apartment was beaming benevolently down on him from the transom. "Day, day!" said the guest, cheerfully, "guess you've struck the wrong number. The man suspected of a forgery and being a politician is next door, and the man with four wives is just across the hall."

"I—really—mus' excuse," stammered the for-once abashed special.

"Not all; don't mention it," put in the boarder, jumping down and pulling the quilldriver into the room. "Fact is, I was just laying for one of you fellows; knew you'd be along presently."

"Want to be interviewed?"

"No. I want to show you press gentlemen a little invention of mine that ought to be in the possession of every reporter in the country, and it will be, too. I expect to sell no end of 'em to your paper alone."

"Do, eh?"

"Certainly. I call it the reporters' patent combined spiral spring and India-rubber nose-buffer. You have often, in the fulfillment of your duties, had the door through which you were looking opened most unexpectedly, inflicting a severe blow upon the nasal extremity. This sometimes leads to inflammation, especially where the keyhole is brass; gangrene sets in, lockjaw, death! Now, all you fellows have to do is to carry a patent buffer, put up in one of these elegant morocco cases, and—"

But the newspaper man made a dash for the elevator and escaped.—San Francisco Post.

A Drunkard's Revenge.

During the exhibition of some wild beasts, a few weeks ago, at the theatre of a small town in Thuringia, Germany, a frightful scene occurred. A leopard was not nearly so submissive to the tamer as usual, and dashed wildly about the cage. Suddenly two of the bars gave away, and the animal sprung with a tremendous bound among the spectators in the pit. The terrified people rushed pell-mell to the door, but the beast attacked the hindermost of them with teeth and claws, and in four minutes had killed a woman and a child, and fearfully lacerated four other persons about the face and neck. The moment the leopard escaped from his cage, the beast-tamer and his assistants hurried after it, armed with spears, but were unable to overcome it until it dropped dead from its wounds. On examining the broken bars of the cage it was discovered that they had been filed. An attendant, lately dismissed for drunkenness, has been arrested on suspicion of being the author of this atrocious deed.

Eccentricities of a Town Clock.

The old familiar sound of the town clock is again heard. Though not wound up nor running during the epidemic, it took some strange freaks on more than one occasion. At the funeral of Robert McClinton, our noble, faithful soldier-printer, the clock struck 1, though known not to have been running or striking for weeks before. A gentleman, whose family, including himself, numbered eight, while sitting by the bedside of his son, who was writhing in the hot grasp of yellow fever, was startled one night by this curious clock, which slowly and distinctly struck 7. He started from his sad reverie, and exclaimed, "There, one must die—we shall be only seven." And one died.—Port Gibson (Miss.) Southern Reveille.

Six Pairs of Twins.

On Tuesday, Mr. George W. Young, of Aquebogue, found four pairs of twin lambs added to his flock; soon afterward a pair of twin calves, and before night Mrs. Young presented him with a fine pair of twins—a boy and girl. He celebrated the events of the day by a grand oyster supper.—New York Sun.

THE Southern Express Company refuses, from date until Dec. 1 next, to receive for transportation bodies of persons who died of yellow fever in 1878.

PERSONALS.

CONSUL BRET HARTE is lecturing in England.

ELIHU BURRITT left $8,000 worth of real estate.

ENGLISH MINISTER WELSH is taking his ease in Italy.

SPANISH MINISTER LOWELL is rusticating in France.

RUSSIAN MINISTER STOUGHTON is traveling in Germany.

EX-SENATOR HOWE will settle down at Green Bay, Wis.

ELIHU BURRITT, the "learned blacksmith," was master of thirty languages.

EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN, the poet, will write a life of Bayard Taylor.

BALLOONIST JOHN WISE writes that the North pole can never be reached save in an air-ship.

EX-GOV. SAMUEL J. TILDEN has sold out, for about $3,000,000, his interest in the New York elevated railroad.

ROBERT P. CROCKETT, a son of the famous Davy Crockett, is living near Granbury, in Hood county, Texas.

THE country will be shocked to learn that Private Dalzell, of the Ohio General Assembly, is quite ill with malarial fever.

APOSTLE MURPHY is now in Kansas. It is said that he will settle permanently at some point on the Kansas Pacific railroad.

WEE HUNG and Hee Chin are among the Chinese in New York, but they don't know how long before they will have to write it Wee Git and Hee Go.

VICTORIA, Crown Princess of Germany, is remarkably fond of horses. When she arrived at the Charing Cross station, not long ago, where her two brothers were waiting to meet her, she was presently seen patting the beautiful horses attached to the royal carriages, and addressing them cheerily.

EX-SENATOR GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE, of Alabama, who died recently at Montgomery, was a native of Boston, but moved to Alabama when a youth, studied law and soon rose to the bench, being for some years Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; he was State Adjutant General during the Rebellion, and in 1870 was elected by the Democrats to the Senate, where he served his term honorably, but without seeking prominence of any sort.

COL. JOHN C. BURCH, the new Secretary of the United States Senate, was born in Georgia. He moved to Chattanooga, Tenn., in 1852, about the time that D. M. Key settled there, and they were neighbors for many years. Burch was elected to the State Senate in 1857, and was chosen Speaker for two years. He became editor of the Union and American in 1859, and has lived in Nashville most of the time since.

SCENE in the Virginia State Senate: Senator Massey rose to a question of privilege and proceeded to read a paper severely reflecting on Senator C. T. Smith, for publishing a speech which reflected on Massey. The language of the paper was to the effect that the speech alluded to, for unrefinement, indelicacy, coarseness, misrepresentation, defamation and vindictiveness, surpassed anything he had ever heard in the halls of the Legislature. Proceeding with similar severe language, Senator Massey was several times called to order, and during his remarks Senator Smith denounced him as a liar, a scoundrel and a dog.

Playing Theater.

Two Philadelphia boys, Vincent Fallon, 11 years old, and Joseph Perrine, 12 years of age, were playing theater in the kitchen of young Perrine's home. Young Perrine drew a small pistol, pointed it at Fallon and pulled the trigger. The weapon was discharged, the report not being loud enough to be heard by Mrs. Perrine and another son of hers, who were in the parlor. Young Fallon put his hand up to his throat and ran to a drug store near by, where he exclaimed: "I'm shot!" but started toward his home without waiting for an examination. He died before going many paces. The ball had taken effect in the right side of the neck, below the ear, and death had resulted from hemorrhage of an artery.

FARM NOTES.

A GILL of raw (unboiled) linseed oil given to a sow, just before and after farrowing, will prevent the disposition to eat her offspring. This habit is an acquired one, and is caused by keeping the sow with others of her own species, who worry and annoy her. Perfect quiet and isolation are considerations which should not be neglected.

WE ferment manure for the same reason that we decompose bone-dust or mineral phosphates with sulphuric acid and convert them into superphosphate, or for the same reason that we grind our corn and cook the meal. These processes add nothing to the amount of plant-food in the bones or the nutriment in the corn. They only increase its availability. So in fermenting manure. This process renders the plant-food in the manure more immediately available.

THE farmer who is habitually careful with his seed-grain, so as to get only the best, is doing much toward advancing the products of his fields, not only in starting his crop—in which it is so important—but throughout its entire growth, including the berry which is to form the seed for the succeeding year. This is apt to be plumper and sounder, and much the better calculated for the next sowing, and an improvement upon the last. I include with the grains the seed also of the forage plants. Always the best growths should be selected, the greatest difficulty being to obtain clean seed, and keep it clean, on account of the foul condition of the land.

AN enthusiastic breeder of poultry says: "Farmers will feed a bushel of corn to produce six pounds of pork, while the same amount of corn will keep a good laying hen one year, and she will produce at least twelve dozen eggs, averaging 18 cents per dozen, which would equal $2.16; in addition she would rear a brood of chickens worth as much more, making a total of nearly $5 against six pounds of pork at 10 cents, equaling 60 cents; or, in other words, the hen will yield seven times as much as the pig on the same quantity of food." Aside from the profit, which is an important consideration in the keeping of poultry, it affords a healthful recreation and enjoyment to all classes. Those who daily toil in the counting-house, factory or mill, each and all need some light, attractive, health-producing employment.

COWS.—Treat them generously and kindly, but do not keep them fat, unless they are to be turned off for beef. A cow is a machine, a laboratory for converting raw materials into milk. If little be given, little will be received. All animals should have exercise, especially those kept for breeding. Some of them are naturally lazy, but they will be the better for stirring about in the open air. It is cruel to keep animals tied up or shut up for days at a time. They need light, too. Direct sunshine exerts a powerful influence for good on animals, as well as on plants. Do not overlook a good supply of pure water two or three times a day; or good ventilation and proper clearing of stables. When the ground is frozen and covered with snow it may be well enough, on pleasant days, to scatter the fodder, and allow the stock plenty of room to pick it up; but when it is muddy no one but a sloven will fodder on the ground. Good racks should be made, for the sake of convenience and economy.

REMEDY FOR ROUP.—To cure the roup, when a bird is attacked with the characteristic cough of the malady, or has tenacious mucus about the beak with difficulty of breathing, I place it in a wicker coop in a quiet shed, and put before it a drinking fountain containing about a gill of water with which I have mixed one drop of solution of aconite, third potency (may be had of any homeopathic physician). In every instance during three years this treatment has had an effect almost marvelous, for, upon visiting the patient an hour or two afterward, I have found that the symptoms have vanished. The attack for a day or two is liable to return, yet each time in a lighter form; but continuing the application has in no instance with us failed completely to remove the ailment in about forty-eight hours. In case the disease should have made so much progress before it is observed that the sufferer is unable to drink, it will be necessary to give the dose. This is easily accomplished by pouring into the throat about a teaspoonful of the water every hour. Such an instance occurred here during excessive wet weather, when I was absent from one of the houses two days. Upon going to see that all was kept in condition, I found a fine old fellow under one of the porches almost dead from very acute roup. I separated and dosed him immediately. He soon lost all the roupy symptoms, but continued extremely weak, and appeared to be fast sinking from atrophy. A medical friend suggested trying the homeopathic solution of arsenicum. His advice was taken, with the best result.—Fanciers' Journal.

Death of Andy Johnson, Jr.

The only son of ex-President Johnson, Andrew Johnson, Jr., died at his residence near Greenville, Tenn., recently. For a time after his father's death he lived in the old home at Greenville and edited a weekly paper. Later he was a candidate for the Legislature, but was defeated. Then he settled on a farm, and at the time of his death was engaged in agricultural pursuits. He leaves a widow. On the 14th inst. his remains were interred beside those of his parents, and about his grave stood his sisters, the last surviving members of the family, Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. Stover. Andrew Johnson had three sons, the eldest of whom was killed by being thrown from his horse in Nashville during the war. Robert, the second son, died after the family returned to Greenville. He was found dead in his bed one morning, having retired as well as usual the preceding evening. The male representatives of the family now are the two grandsons of Mr. Johnson—Andrew Johnson Patterson and Andrew Johnson Stover.

PROVERBS IN COOKERY.

BY MISS DODDS, OF PHILADELPHIA.

There is a greenness in onions and potatoes that renders them hard to digest. For health's sake, put them in warm water for an hour before cooking.

The only kind of a stove with which you can preserve a uniform heat is a gas stove; with it you can simmer a pot for an hour or boil it at the same rate for twenty minutes.

Good flour is not tested by its color. White flour may not be the best. The test of good flour is by the amount of water it absorbs.

In cooking a fowl, to ascertain when it is done put a skewer into the breast, and if the breast is tender the fowl is done.

A few dried or preserved cherries, with the stones out, are the very best things possible to garnish sweet dishes.

Single cream is cream that has stood on the milk twelve hours. It is best for tea and coffee. Double cream stands on its milk twenty-four hours, and cream for butter frequently stands forty-eight hours. Cream that is to be whipped should not be butter cream, lest in whipping it change to butter.

To beat the whites of eggs quickly put in a pinch of salt. The cooler the eggs the quicker they will froth. Salt cools and also freshens them.

In boiling eggs hard put them in boiling water ten minutes and then put them in cold water. It will prevent the yolks from coloring black.

Cutlets and steaks may be fried as well as broiled, but they must be put in hot butter or lard. The grease is not enough when it throws off a bluish smoke.

You must never attempt to boil the dressing of a clear soup in the stock, for it will always discolor the soup.

In making any sauce put the butter and flour in together and your sauce will never be lumpy.

Whenever you see your sauce boil from the sides of the pan you may know your flour or corn-starch is done.

Boiled fowl with sauce, over which grate the yolk of eggs, is a magnificent dish for luncheon.

Tepid water is produced by combining two-thirds cold and one-third boiling.

To make macaroni tender, put it in cold water and bring it to a boil. It will then be much more tender than if put into hot water or stewed in milk.

The yolk of egg binds the crust much better than the whites. Apply it to the edges with a brush.

Old potatoes may be freshened up by plunging them into cold water before cooking them.

Never put a pudding that is to be steamed in anything else than a dry mold.

Never wash raisins that are to be used in sweet dishes. It will make the pudding heavy. To clean them wipe them in a dry towel.

To brown sugar for sauces or for puddings put the sugar in a perfectly-dry saucepan. If the pan is the least bit wet the sugar will burn and you will spoil your saucepan.

The water used in mixing bread must be tepid hot. If it is too hot, the loaf will be full of great holes.

To boil potatoes successfully: When the skin breaks pour off the water and let them finish cooking in their own steam.

In making a crust of any kind do not melt the lard in the flour. Melting will injure the crust.

In boiling dumplings of any kind put them in the water one at a time. If they are put in together they will mix with each other.

Married Her Father's Coachman.

Social circles in Hartford, Ct., are much exercised over the marriage of Miss Nellie, youngest daughter of ex-Gov. Hubbard, to Frederick Shepard, the family coachman. It is an event so uncommon in Connecticut that only one precedent can be thought of, and that was the elopement, some years ago, of the young and beautiful Miss Mallory, of New Haven, with an Irish groom, which shook the foundations of society in that place; but the marriage has proved a happy one, and to-day the couple are living contentedly in Providence. Upon Mr. Mallory's death he left his daughter $25,000 in her own right.

In this case the youth of the girl—she has not yet passed her 18th birthday—largely excuses her conduct, while nothing so far explains it. She has had a delightful home, surrounded by all the luxuries of life, and there has nothing appeared in her conduct to excite the least suspicion that her affection was being drawn toward the man she has chosen. When the facts were known they produced overwhelming astonishment; and then, naturally, perhaps, it was remembered that she had frequently driven out alone with the coachman, and had taken horseback rides with him. The coachman is about 30 years of age; a fellow of uncommonly good personal appearance and pleasing manners. His parents live in Hartford, being natives there, and are respectable people. The worst that can be said of him, perhaps, is that, prior to a year and a half ago, before he entered the service of Gov. Hubbard, he was a hackman, and the inference is drawn that his habits cannot have been good, but this is mainly speculative. He is reported not to have had many advantages in his school-days, and it is further said that Miss Hubbard became interested in him at first through a desire to instruct him in ways of culture by reading, she being an excellent scholar; and it is probable that the intimacy was first formed through the well-intentioned and innocent designs of the girl.—New York Tribune.

Grant in India.

A letter from Bombay says that Gen. Grant was quite overwhelmed with the profusion of servants who were detailed to wait upon his every movement while a guest at the Government house. When he went out for a stroll it was with a small procession, a scarlet servant running ahead to announce him and other scarlet servants in his train. When he went out at night to dinner, men in scarlet lighted his steps with lanterns, and when he drove out there was always a guard of native horsemen.

Mr. Borie was a good deal annoyed by the superfluous attentions of the escort, and was quite disconsolate one morning over a native who was creeping around him, tearing his buttons and trying to put him in order. He has added to his knowledge of tongues the Hindoostan phrase for "Let me alone."

Mrs. Grant enjoyed every moment of the visit, and Col. Fred managed to kill time by rambling over the country with a swarthy attendant, holding an umbrella over his head.

CONFEDERATE HARD MONEY.

Four Coins Struck Off by the Confederate Government Resurrected.

[From the Philadelphia Record.]

It has been believed and recorded as an historical fact that the Southern Confederacy had no metallic currency. After a lapse of eighteen years, evidence now presents itself to show that four coins were struck off at the New Orleans mint while that place was in the possession of the Confederate Government. This confession has been brought about by a Record item, entitled "A Craze for Coins," which gave the fancy prices placed upon rare pieces.

A few days subsequent to the publication, Mr. Mason, the numismatist, of 143 North Tenth street, who was incidentally referred to in the article, received a communication from B. F. Taylor, M. D., the Secretary and Treasurer of the Louisiana State Board of Health, giving the information that he had a Confederate coin in his possession. In reply, Mr. Mason wrote for a lead-pencil rubbing of the piece, at the time expressing a doubt as to the existence of any genuine coins of the Confederate States. The return mail brought a rubbing of the coin.

The obverse represents a Liberty cap, above the American shield, the union of the latter containing seven stars, representing the seven seceding States, the whole being surrounded with a wreath of sugar-cane and cotton in bloom and the motto "Confederate States of America." The reverse has the Goddess of Liberty, with the thirteen stars, representing the States from which the Confederacy sprang, and the date, "1861."

The history of the coin may be briefly recapitulated from Mr. Taylor's statement. When the New Orleans mint was taken possession of by the Confederates in April, 1861, the original dies of the United States were canceled in the presence of the officials connected with the building. The Confederate Cabinet, which was then sitting at Montgomery, issued orders for a design for a Confederate currency to Mr. Taylor, who was then Chief Coiner of the Mint. The above design was submitted and approved, and orders were issued for the striking off of specimen pieces. Four half-dollars were accordingly coined, and these also, following the design, were approved by the Cabinet. Then came an obstacle. That body found that it had not control of sufficient bullion to proceed with an issue of coins, and, consequently, the matter was deferred, and a temporary issue of paper money decided upon. The subsequent rout of the Confederates threw the coinage project overboard.

Of the four coins struck, one is in the possession of one of the chiefs of the Confederate Government, the second was presented to Prof. Biddle, of the University of Louisiana; the third to Dr. Ames, of New Orleans, and the fourth was retained by Chief Coiner Taylor, by permission of the Cabinet.

It is a noteworthy fact that all the individuals who were connected with the coinage, including the Superintendent of the Mint, Assayer, Coiner, Engraver, Die Sinker, down to the man who held the chisel and used the hammer, in the canceling of the old and new dies, are living at the present time. To Mr. Mason, in whose hands the coin has been placed, quite a number of bids have been made by numismatic and historical societies for the purchase of this rare relic of the Rebellion.

A silver-plated electrotype copy is to be sent to all societies interested in such matters, but they will all cry for the original.

A Literary Curiosity.

The following, sent us by an intelligent lady correspondent, is one of the most remarkable compositions we have ever met with. It evinces an ingenuity of arrangement peculiarly its own. Explanation: The initial capitals spell, "My boast is in the glorious cross of Christ." The words in italics, when read from top to bottom and bottom to top, form the Lord's prayer complete:

Make known the Gospel truths, our Father King,
  Yield up Thy grace, dear Father from above,
Bless us with hearts which feelingly can sing,
  "Our life Thou art for ever, God of Love!"
Assuage our grief in love for Christ, we pray.
  Since the bright Prince of Heaven and glory died,
Took all our sins and hallowed the display,
  Infant be-ing, first a man, and then was crucified.
Stupendous God! Thy grace and power make known;
  In Jesus' name let all the world rejoice,
Now labor in Thy heavenly kingdom own.
  That blessed kingdom for Thy saints the choice,
How vile to come to Thee is all our cry.
  Enemies to Thy self and all that's Thine,
Graceless our will; we live for vanity,
  Loathing the very be-ing, evil in design,
O God, Thy will be done from earth to heaven;
  Reclining on the Gospel, let us live,
In earth from sin deliver-ed and forgiven.
  Oh! as Thyself but teach us to forgive,
Unless its power temptation doth destroy,
  Sure is our fall into the depth of wo.
Carnal in mind, we've not a glimpse of joy
  Raised against Heaven; in us, hope we can know.
O give us grace and lead us on Thy way;
  Shine on us with Thy love and give us peace,
Self and this sin that rise against us slay,
  Oh! grant each day our trespass-es may cease,
Forgive our evil deeds that oft we do,
  Convince us daily of them to our shame,
Help us with heavenly bread; forgive us, too,
  Recurrent lusts, and we'll adore Thy name;
    Thy forgive-ness we as saints can die,
  Since for us and our trespasses so high,
Thy Son, our Savior, bled on Calvary.

KENTUCKY HOMICIDE.

Interview with the Murderer of Appellate Judge Elliott.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal.]

Correspondent—"Have you any objections to talking with me upon the subject of the killing of Judge Elliott?"

Buford—"None in the least; I will tell you all about it."

Here he entered into the particulars of the lawsuit lately decided against him in the Court of Appeals, entitled, "Buford's Administrator vs. Guthrie." He went over the whole ground, and said that his sister, Mary F. Buford, had been robbed and murdered by the decision of the Court of Appeals.

Correspondent—"Please give me the particulars of the killing."

Mr. Buford—"Oh, that is easily told. I made up my mind to kill him. I thought on Monday I would kill both him and Judge Pryor; but I thought of Judge Pryor's children, and took a walk to see if I could not save Pryor on account of his children. I finally concluded to do so. Twelve months ago, in March or April, I came to Frankfort determined to kill Judge Pryor. I had twenty-four buckshot in a flannel bag for him and somebody else, but I changed my mind."

Correspondent—"Well, why did you change your mind?"

Buford—"Judge Pryor knew all the particulars of my case; he knew how my sister had been wronged, and could have controlled the decision; but the case was not yet decided, and I determined to wait."

Correspondent—"Well, tell me about the killing of Judge Elliott."

Buford—"I made up my mind to kill him, not because he was the first to decide the case against me, but because he gave me a Judas kiss. He came to me after the decision and said, 'Colonel, I did all I could for you.' I knew that was a lie. I knew the profession was against me."

Here he went again into the particulars of the case, and, upon being asked to tell about the shooting of Judge Elliott, said:

"My gun was loaded with twelve buck-shot in each barrel. I thought this morning I would go snipe-hunting. I met Judge Elliott and said to him: 'Judge, I believe I will go snipe-hunting; won't you go along?' He said, 'No.'

"I then asked him if he would go and take a drink, and raised my gun and pulled the trigger. It went off clear as a bell. He fell upon the pavement, and then I was sorry. I leaned down and placed my hat under his head. I wished to treat him with as much courtesy as he had shown in the robbery and assassination of my sister by his decision. It was the most ignominious game that my gun ever killed. I was arrested then, and gave the Sheriff a letter to my niece, Annie O. Wallace. You can see the letter. I simply gave her all my estate in law and equity, and asked to be buried by my sister. I did not intend to kill Judge Hines or Judge Pryor. I killed Elliott to try my case, to show that they could not rob and assassinate with impunity. Last week I was down to Henry, and I knelt on my sister's grave and swore to gain this suit or die with her. I know what I have done. I made up my mind, and I am ready to take the consequences. I had a pistol in my pocket, and intended to use it if the shotgun failed; but it did not fail."

The morning of the murder Buford called at Judge Cofer's residence, and remained with him about three-quarters of an hour. Judge Cofer's room was up-stairs, and, when Buford went down, he called to the Judge to come down and help him to find his umbrella. Mrs. Cofer, who happened to be present, not liking the action, went down herself, and handed him the umbrella from the rack. It is believed he went there with an idea of killing Judge Cofer, and was only prevented by the presence of his wife. A short time before he met Judge Elliott he met Judge Pryor going in at the front entrance of the Capital Hotel. He stopped him and said: "Judge Pryor, have you anything against me?" To which Judge Pryor responded: "Why, certainly not, Tom." He then said something about Guthrie, but, at that moment, Col. Weissinger, of Louisville, took Judge Pryor by the arm and asked him to go and get some cider. The opinion is that, but for this interference, he would have attempted the life of Judge Pryor with his pistol.

Cheating at Cards by Machinery.

Isaac Finberg and Frank Basseet were held for the Grand Jury in default of $3,000 bail by the Police Judge on a charge of burglary in the second degree. They broke into a room in the Rock House, on Broadway street, a few days ago, and stole, among other things, a quantity of gambler's implements. Among the latter was an exceedingly ingenious apparatus which was exhibited in court as evidence against the men, and is designed to facilitate cheating at cards. The contrivance consists of an arrangement of springs in a frame which passes around the player's arm, beneath his coat-sleeve, and contains the cards designed to be used in cheating. Attached to the apparatus is a string which passes around the player's body to his left hand. By means of the string the player can throw out the cards so as to "stock" his hand, and withdraw those that he does not consider strong enough to play against his opponent. The machine bore evidence of long service, and has doubtless emptied the pockets of many a greenhorn.—San Francisco Bulletin.

Origin of Wheat and Corn.

The origin of wheat is a subject of much speculation. It is not certainly known in a wild state. Some suppose it descended from extinct wild species; others, that it is the cultivated form of what are now regarded as distinct wild species. About 1855 a Mons. Fabre claimed to have developed wheat by careful cultivation, during twelve years, from ægilops ovata, a grass common to the South of Europe, but the assertion has been generally discredited. Wheat has been a cultivated plant since long before historical times; the number of varieties is very large, one Frenchman having cultivated as many as 392, and many suppose there must have been three or four original species of the plant, but the entire subject of its origin is mere conjecture. Corn, according to Alphonse de Candolle and Darwin, is of American origin, and seems to have undergone no specific change since the earliest ages, Darwin having found in South America heads of maize imbedded in a beach which had been raised at least eighty-five feet above the sea.—Rural New Yorker.

INDIANA LEGISLATURE.

THURSDAY, March 27.—SENATE.—The Senate on assembling took up the bill codifying the School law, and its consideration occupied the entire morning session and a portion of the afternoon. Amendments were adopted, after considerable discussion, limiting the examination fee to $1, and prohibiting changes in school books or furniture oftener than every ten years, except by unanimous consent of the School Board. The bill was then passed....The conference committee on the Fee and Salary bill then reported, and the report was concurred in without debate. ....The conference committee on the bill creating a Bureau of Statistics also reported, and their report was adopted....All the House bills on second reading were taken up, read a second time, and passed to a third reading.... Several Senate bills were read a second time and indefinitely postponed....The conference committee on the Homestead Exemption bill reported that they could not agree. They were discharged and a new committee appointed.

HOUSE.—Bills passed: Legalizing "patent-inside" newspapers; amending the act concerning guardian and ward; amending the code; for the publication of legal advertising in any paper of general circulation in the county; amending the Voluntary Assignment act; amending the law of descent; to prevent double prosecution in misdemeanors; exempting the property of wives and children from sale on execution for husbands' torts; to prevent the transfer of county orders by persons owing taxes; permitting towns to collect license from retail liquor-dealers; amending the code; requiring railroads to have whistles sounded at road crossings; specifying what persons shall be admitted to the House of Refuge; requiring attorneys to submit charges to Judges for rejection or acceptance before argument....The conference committees' reports on the Fee and Salary and Bureau of Statistics bills were concurred in.

FRIDAY, March 28.—A bill passed to do away with Coroners' juries, making that official to examine and report alone upon the cause of death submitted to him....The report of the conference committee on the Exemption bill, fixing the amount at $600, an increase of $300 over the present law, to be taken in real estate or personal property at the election of the debtor, was adopted....The Bureau of Statistics bill has been adopted, and now there are no other important bills to be acted on.... At the close of the evening session of the House, the committee charged with the investigation of Messrs. Jameson and Evarts, of the Insane Asylum, submitted their reports and ordered them laid upon the table till morning. The majority report, signed by Senators Smith and Treat, and Representatives Hubbard, Saint and Thornburg, is very long, and, in the main, favorable to the respondent. The minority report, signed by Senator Foster, Chairman of the committee, and Representatives Reiley, Edwins and Handy, finds Dr. Jameson guilty of not turning over to the State treasury moneys received for farm and greenhouse products, and for receiving, as Treasurer of the Commissioners for the new Asylum building, $1,400, without warrant of law. Following this report, Messrs. Edwins and Handy submit a resolution censuring Drs. Jameson and Evarts for malfeasance in office, and requesting the Attorney General to institute suit for the recovery of $1,400 wrongfully appropriated by Dr. James.

SATURDAY, March 29.—SENATE.—The proceedings in the Senate were unusually dull, nothing but confusion interrupting the dry routine of passing bills, and that was the only business transacted, with the exception of the introduction and reference to the Finance Committee of a resolution appropriating $450 to defray the expenses of the Insane Asylum investigation....The following bills were passed: Regulating the practice of dentistry; concerning the opening of streets and alleys; regulating the running at large of animals; relative to claims against counties; regulating the punishment for contempts; amending section 347 of the code providing for the prompt publication of the acts of the General Assembly; requiring petitioners for the opening of streets to file a bond for the cost; punishing embezzlement of railroad tickets, and authorizing the vacation of public squares in certain cases....The Senate then took up the message from the House announcing the passage of the Medical bill over the Governor's veto, and, the question being on the passage of the bill by the Senate, it failed for want of a constitutional majority—ayes, 29; noes, 15.

HOUSE.—The House, as far as noise was concerned, was worse than the Senate, and it was impossible for the Speaker to keep order.... The Senate resolution providing for the payment of Marion county for gas, water and fuel used by the Legislature was amended so as to allow $850, and then passed....The bill reducing the pay of members to $5 per day and reducing the salaries of Judges failed to pass. ....The message of the Governor vetoing the Medical bill was read. He objects to the bill for the reason that it contains an emergency clause and that it bars from practice all female physicians and midwives. An attempt was made to pass the bill notwithstanding the veto, but it failed. Later in the day the bill was passed by a vote of 52 to 30....The Senate bill regulating the inspection of petroleum was passed and the bill abolishing the Cass Superior Court was promptly laid on the table....A local-option temperance bill was voted down and the bill to abolish concert saloons and prevent the playing of billiards, etc., in saloons, which had been stolen from the files, was reintroduced, but a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was not agreed to....The committee to which was referred the subject of woman's suffrage made three reports. One decides that the Constitution gives women the right to vote; second that it does not, but ought to, and the third, signed by Maurice Thompson, thinks women too good to vote, almost to good to live and too sweet for anything; therefore that they should not vote.

MONDAY, March 31.—SENATE.—The resolution for the payment of the expenses of the Insane Asylum investigation was passed, as was one requesting Congress to appropriate $100,000 to dredge out the channel of the Kankakee river, and $50,000 for the Calumet....The investigating committee made their reports on the Insane Asylum investigation, which were placed on the files without action....The special committee on wet lands were authorized to collect information relative to the drainage of the Kankakee, and report to the Senate at its next session....A concurrent resolution was adopted instructing the Attorney General to make a complete examination of the books and papers of his two predecessors, Denny and Buskirk, and take such action as may be necessary to recover any moneys wrongfully collected by them....Senator Viche was declared President pro tem., and then, after adopting several resolutions relative to the closing up of the session, Lieut. Gov. Gray made a few feeling and eloquent remarks, and declared the Senate adjourned sine die.

HOUSE.—A resolution was adopted authorizing the appointment of a special committee to continue the investigation of the Attorney General's office, directing as to what they should investigate, and requiring all officers they may call upon for information to impart the same to them....A concurrent resolution was offered requiring that the title and number of each act passed during the session be published in two Indianapolis papers within thirty days....After the adoption of resolutions of thanks, and the concurrence of several Senate resolutions, several of the members made farewell speeches. The Speaker, after a few fitting remarks concerning the work of the sessions, and after returning his thanks to the members, at a few minutes after 12 o'clock declared the House adjourned without day.

SUPERVISORS AND MARSHALS.

What They Cost the People and the Work They Perform.

[From the New York Sun.]

The resolution of the Senate calling for a detailed statement of the accounts of United States Marshals in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts and Maryland, for the payment of wages or fees charged for services performed by them or their special deputies in relation to the conduct of elections in November, 1878, showing the amount claimed by, or paid to, each of said special deputies and the aggregate claimed by the Marshals for services, does not cover the whole grounds by any means.

There is no mention of the Chief Supervisor's accounts for Southern and Northern New York, which had been kept back by these officers, and were not in possession of the department three months after the election, for reasons which may be easily supposed. This resolution is also defective in making no mention of the Marshal's "general deputies," the number of which is only restricted by his partisan discretion, and which are specifically named in the odious Election laws, and especially in section 5,522 of the Revised Statutes, under which they are clothed with the arbitrary power to make "instant arrest without process" of any person who "refuses or neglects to aid and assist" them in the work of carrying elections by intimidation and threats.

The Comptroller of the Treasury furnished a statement to the Committee on Expenditures of the Department of Justice in the last House, covering the accounts of Supervisors and Deputy Marshals in 1878, which had been settled up to the middle of February, "except for Chief Supervisors in Northern and Southern New York, which have not been sent to the department, those of New Jersey, Eastern New York, and Pennsylvania not fully adjusted."

According to that report, excluding the accounts which had not been returned or closed, over $202,000 were expended for Supervisors and Deputy Marshals at the elections last fall. An analysis of the localities in which these expenditures were made shows conclusively that this public money was used to aid the election of Republican candidates for Congress, and that the Deputy Marshals were electioneering agents at the polls. The whole scheme was organized at Washington by the Republican Campaign Committee, with an understanding in the Department of Justice by which the Deputy Marshals were assigned to doubtful and close districts, North and South, in the hope of capturing a majority in the present House of Representatives.

To aid that object, the assessment of officeholders was openly made in all the departments, upon Chandler's model of 1876, with agents who personally visited every incumbent, tariff in hand, fixing the amount to be paid from the salary. Hayes, Evarts, Schurz and the whole fraudulent Cabinet, all the chiefs of bureaus, and the bulk of the 4,000 or 5,000 subordinates, subscribed to this campaign fund; and when a clerk, who was deluded with the belief that there was something in the profession of civil-service reform and in the executive order forbidding assessments, refused to be taxed, John Sherman ordered his removal instantly.

More than one-half of the whole expenditure for Supervisors and Deputy Marshals in 1878 was made in this State, as follows:

Southern district	$59,267.95
Eastern district	33,092.35
Northern district	18,000.00
Total	$111,360.26

Chief Supervisor Davenport and his colleagues in Northern New York withheld their returns, and the accounts of the chief of the Eastern district were "not fully adjusted" when the Comptroller of the Treasury furnished these figures.

Davenport's operations here are well known, and the Congressional delegation in the House would seem to prove remarkable efficiency on the part of the other Supervisors and Deputy Marshals throughout the State. Over in New Jersey more than $13,000 of this fund were put where they would do the most good for the Republican candidates, and with sufficient effect to change the political complexion of the representation in the House. Pennsylvania got $44,000, chiefly applied to the Eastern districts, on the Cameronian plan. In Maryland, some $8,000 were successfully concentrated on the Sixth district with a knowledge of a Democratic defection to weaken the hold of the regular nominee. To defeat Gen. Williams in the Detroit district, all of the force of the administration was applied to that point; so in Virginia in the district now represented by Jorgensen (Republican), of which fears were entertained; also in South Carolina, to prevent the election of Mr. O'Connor, who got through in spite of the Deputy Marshals and the notorious Mackey; so in the two Cincinnati districts, which will soon be investigated; so in the Eighth district of Alabama, where Lowe (Greenbacker) was elected over the regular Democrat; and so in Louisiana, where the Republicans expected to carry two districts.

These spots were all deliberately chosen at Washington, after correspondence with the Republican managers. The campaign fund was raised by drafts on the treasury for the Supervisors and Deputy Marshals, by assessments on the officeholders, and by contributions from the pet banks, to say nothing of the local subscriptions and donations. A round million, at least, was used in doubtful districts, and, if the result could have been foreseen, a million more would have been raised to make a Republican majority in the House sure.

If the Democrats mean to go to the bottom of this business, another resolution to include the cost of "general deputies," omitted by Mr. Wallace from his inquiry, and to bring in every account of Supervisors, and for contingent expenses of the elections of 1878, ought to be passed. The country wants the whole truth, and not fragments of it.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, APR. 10, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY, EDITORS.

A fire in Philadelphia last Sunday morning destroyed property amounting to $750,000, and several firemen and citizens were killed.

It requires ten men, working 18 hours a day, to distribute and deliver the mails at the post-office in Leadville, Colorado, whereas, six months ago, two men transacted the business of the office with ease.

The charge of having voted for the law authorizing supervisors of elections to make arbitrary arrests, as preferred against Governor Hendricks by some republican speakers, is absolutely false, as he left the senate two years before the act was approved.

Since the republicans of the north are so anxious that the colored man should hold office in the south, the Atlanta Constitution wants to know why it is that no northern republican constituency has, up to this time, sent a negro to congress, or as a legislative representative?

The Louisville Courier-Journal says: "Some of the republican organs tell us that the democratic proposition to keep federal troops from blocking the way to the polls is an 'attack on the ballot.' It is an attack on the ballot thieves. That is what is the matter with the organs, big and little."

Will some person be kind enough to send Murray, of the South Bend Herald, a plat of the new congressional districts? He evidently thinks he is in the twelfth district, else, he thinks the democracy of this district sadly in need of a guardian. About three years from now will be time enough to talk about a new man for congress.

Judge Samuel H. Buskirk was buried at Bloomington last Sunday. His remains were conveyed to that place from Indianapolis by a special train. The funeral cortege was the largest ever witnessed in Bloomington. It is estimated that at least 5,000 people viewed the remains at the cemetery. Another great jurist has passed away.

Warren Tate, who has been on trial at Indianapolis for the last three weeks, charged with the murder of Wm. Love, was acquitted by the jury. The influence of money has again been demonstrated. Tate is a man of questionable reputation, his wife a notorious prostitute, both wealthy, which no doubt accounts for the unexpected result of the trial.

According to Harpers Weekly, (Nast) if the republican party has stolen $100 000 (it has stolen a thousand times that amount) and it costs $100,000, to prove it, it is "six of one, and a half dozen of the other," or in other words, the government has gained nothing by the investigation. That is unadulterated republican doctrine—the theory upon which the republican party of to-day bases every party measure. Members of that party are made popular in accordance with their ability to do a good square job of stealing, and when proven guilty it adds still more to their claims for prominence as party leaders. Will the time never come when honest, fair minded republicans will realize that the banner of the party they have so long honored is now being trailed in the most filthy by-ways of political prostitution? It does not require very close observation to discover that the so-called republican party of to day, is not the republican party of eighteen years ago.

The republican press of the north is devoting considerable space to editorials concerning the number of southern generals now members of congress. A democratic exchange in reply, says: "The republicans have doubtless overlooked the fact that a "confederate brigadier" is a member of President Hayes' cabinet; that Mosby, who was a confederate guerilla during the war, is now a leading republican; and doubtless, many of our readers remember the time a little band of federal troops were surrounded by the rebel army at Knoxville, Tenn., and compelled to subsist many days upon parched corn alone, until federal troops could be sent to their relief. The commander of the rebel army that besieged Knoxville, and starved our gallant boys for many days, was General Longstreet who is now a patriot, in the eyes of republicans, and draws an annual salary as a federal office-holder. So it is all over the country, wherever you find a man who fought in the rebel army, and it makes no difference if his hands are dripping with the blood of our gallant soldiers who followed the stars and stripes amidst the iron hail of battle; if he now votes the republican ticket, his sins are all washed away and he stands before the country as a patriot in the eyes of the valiant heroes who served their country as quartermasters and army contractors. The democrats see no difference between the "confederate brigadier" who serves his country and the "confederate brigadier" who sits in the cabinet of a republican president and holds a federal office by virtue of an appointment of a republican administration. What the country wants, and will enforce as a test of loyalty, is respect for the stars and stripes wherever they wave—north, south, east or west."

Not long since a leading republican paper of northern Indiana took occasion to name several gentlemen who have been connected with the editorial department of the Fort Wayne Sentinel, claiming that they were formerly republicans but had since been acting with the democratic party. The article referred to did not contain the name of Will H. Kernan who was at one time connected with the Sentinel and who was discharged by the proprietor on account of his radical republican views. This same Will H. Kernan is now editor of the Southern States, a newspaper published at Okalona, Miss. in the interest of the republican party. He is the author of the "Yes; thank God!" balderdash that is now being republished under attractive head-lines, by almost every republican paper in the north. This same Kernan is a republican of the new school, a genuine dyed in-the-wool radical,—a regular stinker, who is undoubtedly a paid tool, sent to the south in the interest of the bloody-shirt party, to publish all kinds of treasonable articles intended to fire the northern heart. The republican editor who reproduces the crack-brained Kernan's editorials, does it with the intention of deceiving his readers and prejudicing them against the southern people. The several editors of the DeKalb county Republican are excusable to some extent, as they no doubt published the articles referred to, simply because they found them, comments and all, in some other republican sheet, not knowing that Kernan was a "crazy galoot" from Logan county, Ohio, something after the style of the immortal J. N.

We see from the Ft. Wayne papers that Mr. Foster was tendered a reception by the railroad men of that city, on his return from his senatorial labors last week, for the prodigious efforts he put forth in the passage of the garnishee bill. The boys should not be partial in their demonstrations. Every man in the senate should be treated likewise, for they individually did infinitely more to secure its passage than did Foster, if we are permitted to except ex-Senator Briscoe. A little scene comes to us from behind the curtains. When the bill was up before the committee, its author appeared, and in one of his eloquent speeches, said that he did not give a d—n in what manner they cut and slashed the provisions of the bill; all he asked was to have it retain the number it bore when sent to them, because the record would show that Senator Foster introduced senate bill number so and so, that was all he desired. It was a brilliant achievement for Foster, and it is gratifying to know that a greater duty was not imposed upon him. While he has not the brains of Briscoe, there is more flourish about him. The whole state rested upon the shoulders of Briscoe,—Foster was satisfied with the heft of one bill, and a daily motion to adjourn. Briscoe trembled with his responsibility—Foster bore his with the sweetest placidity. Briscoe saved the state and Foster got the laurels. All this, too, at the beginning of their four years' term. Had it been at the close nothing short of the presidency would have been tendered.

FEES AND SALARIES.

Call for a Convention of County Officers of the State.

(State Sentinel.)

The fee and salary bill passed by the late legislature has created considerable dissatisfaction among county officers, besides being somewhat ambiguous in some respects. The following call for a convention was issued yesterday, and is being mailed by County Clerk Ransdell to all county officers in the state. As will be seen by the call, it bears the date of April 15, though the Sentinel is in receipt of the call eight days earlier:

TO COUNTY OFFICERS.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. April 15, 1879.

We, the undersigned, county officers of the state of Indiana, believing that it would be much to the interest of the people of the state that the fee and salary bill passed by the last legislature should be understood alike by all officers, do hereby call a convention of all county officers to meet at Indianapolis, Wednesday, the 30th day of April. It is therefore hoped and confidently expected that each and every county officer will be present, that a perfect understanding may be arrived at in relation to said law.

D. M. Ransdell, clerk Marion county; Geo. H. K. Moss, clerk DeKalb county; J. T. Pressly, sheriff Marion county; Moses Lewman, sheriff Putnam county; Albert McCorkle, sheriff Shelby county; E. J. Church, auditor Laporte county; Cy Johnson, auditor Tippecanoe county; S. Loftin, treasurer Marion county; C. F. Darnell, recorder Marion county; S. B. Samson, recorder Vanderburgh county; Martin Spencer, clerk Allen county; Wm. Moore, clerk Wayne county; C. A. Munson, sheriff Allen county; R. F. Nugent, sheriff Jefferson county; W. A. Pfaff, auditor Marion county; M. E. Argo, auditor Allen county; Andy Hagen, treasurer Hancock county; N. Rodgers, treasurer Vigo county; C. B. Pritchard, recorder Vigo county; Ephraim Marsh, clerk Hancock county.

Correction.

I will begin school on the THIRD Monday in April, instead of the second, as stated in last week's paper.

LIDA A. POWERS.

We see by the daily press that Hon. B. F. Havens, of Terre Haute, has been nominated by the democracy as a candidate for mayor of that city. We have no means of knowing of his personal popularity at home, but we do know that he possesses every qualification for the position to which he aspires. While a member of the house of representatives of this state in 1875, he rendered splendid service in the interest of his constituency and the democracy generally all over the state. His indefatigable exertions brought about the repeal of the Baxter bill, and he is really the author of the present statute regulating the liquor traffic. It was only by brilliant parliamentary tactics that this was accomplished, and the regular session adjourned without passing an appropriation bill, in order to bring on a special session that a last effort might be made for the repeal of said bill. Being clerk of the house at that time, I distinctly remember with what consummate skill and tact he triumphed over a republican senate, and wiped this failure from the statute book. Possessed of a keen perception, ready at grasping the situation, affable and courteous in manner, we cannot conceive of better timber to occupy the highest position in this prosperous city, and hundreds of friends outside will rejoice to learn of his success. M.

First Place for Hendricks.

It is a mistaken idea that New York is solid for Tilden. Read the following from the New York Evening Express, which takes the Louisville Courier-Journal to task for assigning the second place to Mr. Hendricks. The Express represents a large element of the New York democracy, and puts itself on record as follows: "Thomas A. Hendricks is one of the ablest lawyers in the west. He distinguished himself in congress by his talents, his fairness, his wisdom and his moderation. He commanded the respect of his opponents in that body by the weight and purity of his character and the sagacity of his views. He was one of the best governors Indiana ever had. In that office he displayed remarkable executive power. He made a host of friends and no enemies, by his high-minded, honorable course. He has the universal respect of the people of his state, and the whole west for that matter. In many points he resembles Abraham Lincoln, especially in his honesty, his frankness and candor, his grip on the common people, his love of justice, his profound sympathy with the masses. He was one of the leading candidates for the nomination in the democratic convention in 1876. It was with the greatest difficulty that he was prevailed upon by his friends to accept the nomination for the vice-presidency. He made a great sacrifice of personal interest and feeling by consenting to serve as the second man. After his nomination, through all the campaign in which he had a profound personal interest, in the protracted and intensely exciting contest which followed the election, he was virtually ignored by Tilden and Tilden's confederates, treated as though he had no part or lot in the matter, neglected and pushed aside as though he were a nobody. His name was hardly ever mentioned by Tilden and his understrappers. He was left out in the cold by the wily and selfish manœuverer who had managed to get himself at the head of the ticket, before he was counted out by the electoral commission, about which he was not consulted. Mr. Hendricks has at least ordinary self respect. He will be likely to think twice before he consents to act as second man on any ticket headed by Samuel J. Tilden.

"Three Democrats stand prominently before the country to-day as candidates for the presidency—Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, Mr. Thurman, of Ohio, and Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana. They are able, honorable men. The country would indeed be fortunate to secure the services of either one of them as president. Other things being equal, the next candidate of the democracy should be a western man. Between Senator Thurman and ex-Governor Hendricks it would be very hard indeed to choose. But Mr. Hendricks has one claim to the nomination which Mr. Thurman can not urge, in the fact that for the sake of the party and to strengthen a weak ticket he consented to take the second place when fairly entitled to the first place in 1876, and was counted out of the vice-presidency, to which he was fairly elected. If he is drafted into the service again it must not be as the second man."

The State Sentinel adds, "The views expressed by our New York cotemporary are manifestly in harmony with the sentiments of the great body of the people south and west, and it is not too much to say that in the east Mr. Hendricks would command a larger democratic vote than any other name mentioned in connection with the first place on the ticket. At any rate, it is well enough to state that the Courier-Journal ticket which places Mr. Hendricks second, is not endorsed by the democracy anywhere."

Select School.

A select school will be taught by Miss L. E. Clark and Miss L. McTighe, commencing on April 21, and continuing two months. Tuition, $2.00.

In addition to her school, Miss L. McTighe will teach a class in German.

Northern Prison.

Below will be found the card of Mr. Charles Mayne, to the democracy of Indiana concerning the wardenship of the northern prison, about which there has been so much controversy of late. Our readers can take it and make the best of it:

MICHIGAN CITY, Ind., April 3, 1879.

To the Democracy of Indiana:

I deem it my duty, in view of certain criticisms which have been made upon my action within the past month by a few newspapers, to explain to you and to the people of the state why I have retained the office of warden of the northern prison.

Previous to the democratic caucus last winter Mr. Hoover, who was a candidate for election as a director, pledged himself to my friends to vote for my re-election. Mr. Wile, being from my county, was my friend, and I knew, of course, that two votes would elect. My friends upon the pledges gave their support to Mr. Hoover, which secured the nomination to him, and consequently, his election. Before the newly elected board met to organize, I was informed that corrupt means had been employed to influence the vote of one of the members, and, desiring to maintain the purity of the democratic party, I felt it my duty to pursue a course which would defeat any such arrangement, if I could.

This was the condition of affairs when the new board held their first meeting. Then I learned for the first time that two members (a quorum and a majority) of the old board had decided to hold over, because the law of 1857 for the government of the state prison, and under which the prison north has been governed since its completion, provides "that the legislature shall at that session elect three directors, two of whom shall hold office for four years and one for two years, and that after the first election, and when the terms of office shall have expired, the successor shall be elected for the term of four years." (Sec. two, act February 5, 1857.)

The old board met, held their meeting, and elected me, and I knew that if I declined they would give the place to a republican; therefore, I accepted the office under the election of the old board for the following reasons: (1) Because they were a lawful board and clearly had the right to elect me. This is evidenced by the action of Mr. Wile, who acted first with the new board, and afterwards, by the advice of his attorney, accepted the vacancy in the old board. (2) Because, if I had declined and surrendered the prison to the old board, who undoubtedly had the right to it, they would have removed every democrat in office in the prison, and hence I considered it my duty to hold in the interest of the democratic party.

Whenever the lawful board decides in favor of some other democrat, I will resign my office and allow them to elect another warden, if my party friends desire it. I have intended to do my duty, first to the state and next to my party, and believing that I am on the lawful as well as the democratic party side of the question, I intend standing there until the law shall say that I shall go out. CHARLES MAYNE.

St. Joe.

—Jerry Anderson, of Newville, tried his powers of pedestrianism on Monday, by a trip to Auburn.

—Be it known, by all the lovers of the cue and ball, that the Barney Bros., of Spencerville, have a billiard-table in running order.

—The viewers appointed by the board of commissioners to view location of road near St. Joe, failed to put in an appearance on Monday, the appointed time.

—Mrs. J. D. Leighty paid her friends at Ft. Wayne a visit last week.

—A little bit of scandal one of these days. Look out, boys.

—As usual, some of the farmers are growling about the weather.

—We paid brother Bell, at the bridge shanty, a flying visit on Sabbath, and found everything quiet on the Potomac.

—Preaching at the school-house on Sunday by Rev. Hartman, of Hicksville, Ohio.

—A Sabbath-school was organized at the school-house, on Sabbath, by electing J. A. Reed, superintendent; Chris. Curie, assistant; Mrs. J. D. Leighty, treasurer; Mrs. H. Jaggars, secretary; and O. H. Widney, chorister. With the above officers we do not know why a success cannot be made out of the Sabbath-school at this place.

—Charley Able's residence was raided by some tramps a few days ago, while the family were absent, and goods to the amount of five or six dollars were carried off. We saw Charley several days after buying a lock, wherewith to fasten the door, but we fear that will not bring back the pair of fine boots which Charley says came up minus.

—Considerable hauling and pulling was indulged in at the blacksmith shop lately, by some less than a score of St. Joe's citizens. Hammers were drawn and redrawn; fists and coats were drawn; indignant and saucy words were used, but nobody was hurt. It strikes us very forcibly that blood would have been shed had not the hammer been given up, as the black eyes of the Frenchman do not shine so brightly for naught.

—The spring term of school for this district commenced on Monday, April 7th, with Miss Blake, of Spencertown, for teacher.

—Uncle J. F. Coburn, of Coburn's Corners, one among the oldest of DeKalb's pioneers, is lying at the point of death, having had a stroke of paralysis several days ago. We understand that no hopes are entertained for his recovery.

—It is reported that there is little prospect of the recovery of Mrs. H. Robertson, who is under treatment for her eyes, at Cleveland, Ohio, the operation performed having prostrated her nervous system.

M. SKILER, Sup't.

—Our correspondents are sometimes so late in sending in their communications that they are necessarily set aside. Angola hangs fire this week.

Newville.

—Things quite lively here at present.

—The reading at the hall on Saturday evening was excellent, and everything passed off well inside; not so, however, down stairs. Let it be the last time, boys, that you try to disturb anything of the kind, and all will be well; but if you attempt it again, perhaps you will regret it, as the prosecutor is liable to take [illegible].

—Many people here are getting vaccinated, thinking a prevention better than a cure.

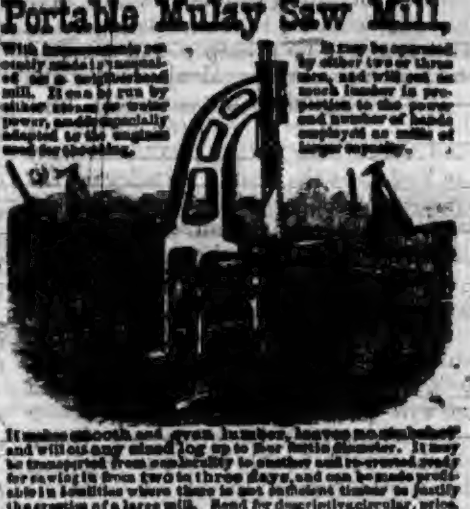
—Geo. W. Wicks delivered an excellent lecture to the reading club, at the hall, on Saturday evening last. Subject, "Truth." It made a favorable impression, and every one seemed pleased.

—The singing-school has closed, but we understand that Mr. Kimball is going to get up another.

—The citizens have procured a splendid book-case for the Vienna literary association.

—H. W. Coburn received a fine lot of new goods last week.

—New Turkish Prunes 14 lbs for $1,00 or 8c per lb at McQuiston & Ralstons.



Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made it is capable of [illegible] a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no [illegible] and will cut any sized log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Auburn Courier.

—A son of Treasurer Gonser, aged about thirteen, met with a serious accident on last Saturday evening. The boy, in company with some others, got hold of some old pistols and loaded them with powder and shot; to discharge the pistols parlor matches and a small piece of iron were used instead of caps, there being no tubes in the pistols. Dennie Gonser had his pistol loaded and lying on his knee when he accidentally dropped the small piece of iron, which struck the pistol and caused a discharge, the contents lodging in his side just above the hip joint. The boy coolly sat down in presence of his comrades and commenced picking the shot out of his flesh; he then went to the house and sat around as though nothing had happened, until one of his playmates told Mr Gonser's family what had occurred. Upon examination of the wound it was found necessary to chloroform the boy in order to remove the remaining shot. The wound was considered dangerous for a few days, but the doctors now pronounce the boy out of danger.

Dr. Swartz has charge of the case. Dr. Ford assisted in the examination of the wound.

—A team belonging to Moses Brandon played particular smash out on the square, one day last week. In turning a corner at the mill, on Seventh street, the wagon capsized and deposited Mr. Brandon on the side-walk, after which the team took matters their own way and dashed down the street, distributing the wagon along the way, in doses about the size of a toothpick. At the north gate of the court-house they changed the programme, trying to work in some hurdle business over a team owned by James Cruse, which was hitched at that place; but they couldn't make it, and so mixed themselves up with the other team and halted. Mr. Cruse's light wagon was mangled beyond all recognition, and the one attached to the runaway team had to be swept up; but no bones were broken or no lives were sacrificed, and thus endeth the chapter of calamities for one day.

—Some party or parties, to the writer unknown, had a big time Monday night at the junction warehouses. Several kegs of beer, stored there for transfer, together with some boxes of household goods and bottled beer, were lugged off and broken into—that is, the beer kegs and bottles were, but the household goods were unmolested; the parties evidently wanted to get on a whiz, and as the foaming lager was better adapted to that purpose than old clothes and canned tomatoes, they tackled it. A few of the bottles were recovered next day at Hicksville and shipped back, but the thieves—oh, where are they? By-the-way, wouldn't one or two good night-watchmen — with a double-barreled bull-dog or so—render some valuable service at this point?

—Our energetic marshal has commenced work upon the streets with a large force of workmen, and in a few days the principal streets will be in excellent condition. Now while the gutters are being cleaned out and the debris being removed, we suggest that there be a general cleaning up of the cross-streets by the residents directly interested; rake up all the rubbish and call upon the marshal to have it hauled away. A little labor in that direction will add greatly to the appearance of the town.

—The recent addition to our office of the front rooms in the second story, gives us the space that the business of the office has long demanded, and furnishes us with as convenient a printing establishment as could be desired. Come up and see us in our new quarters and, if it is not already there, leave your name on the Courier subscription book; it will aid us in giving you a better paper and adding improvements to the office as the business will justify us.

—Can some of our more enlightened brothers tell us why it is that lady visitors never come to a printing-office—i. e. "hardly ever"—when things are in apple-pie order and we are looking our purtiest? It's too hard a problem for us, for they invariably catch us with our coat hanging up in a chair somewhere, sleeves rolled up, and, ten to one, an old clay pipe in our jaws. But we like the girls and are always glad to see 'em, though we would like to have a small boy notify us in advance.

—Hotel business in the city, where clerks have six hours on and six off, and the boss has all his time to himself, is a good thing; but where one man has to work the whole machine and sit up all night to run the chances on getting one lone traveler—and he a tramp, perhaps,—it loses all its charms; and if it doesn't conflict with anybody else's interest and privileges, we'll not take any of it in ours.

Quite as Sensitive.

The sense of smell of the American people is quite as sensitive as that of any country—and certainly, when this faculty is tutored, perfumes may be made in America as excellent as those which come from abroad. Judges of fine odors credit Dr. Price with nice taste in the compounding of his Unique Perfumes.

—Canada barley whisky, the genuine article, can be had at Joe. Beugnot's saloon, the only place it is sold in Auburn.

—Murphy & Baldwin are practical paper hangers. Plain and fancy wall-paper of all kinds put on in a workmanlike manner.

—Mrs. Ira Eaton, whose arm was so badly broken some time since, is getting along nicely. Dr. Casebeer is the attending surgeon.

—Have you ever examined one of Holman's Liver Pads? If not, go to Hoyt's drug store and get a pamphlet giving full particulars.

—Mrs. A. J. Little leaves next Tuesday for the east, and ladies having leghorn hats to be made over will please take them to her this week.

—The Buckeye clothes-wringer only $5.00. For sale by Kiblinger & Co.

—Holman's Liver Pad is sold by C. H. Hoyt at the old stand of McIntyre & Son. Call and examine the great remedy for the cure of ague.

—In our article in last week's issue, concerning the appointment of a trustee, we should have said Franklin township, instead of Richland.

—Mr. M. O. Markle, of Hudson, was in town this week shaking hands with his numerous friends. He reports lively trade in the flouring business.

—If you can find a man in all this broad land who is amiable when he is wet and hungry, just dry him and fill him up and you'll have an angel.

—See those white bed spreads at McQuiston & Ralstons at prices from $1.15 to $2.75 cheaper than you can make quilts. 13-3w

The electoral bill now before the parliament at Rome, increases the number of voters in the kingdom by one million three hundred thousand.

—F. S. Clark, agent at the junction depot for the Eel River and Jackson roads, has been taking a lay off for a few weeks. Typhoid fever did it.

—Staple and fancy dry goods of every description, the largest stock ever brought to Auburn, is now being offered to the public by Schaab, Beugnot & Co.

—McQuiston & Ralston sell 2 good cigars for 5c also the Veto and Bellmans Red Bird the best 5 cent cigar sold, will furnish dealers cigars at jobbers prices.

—And now for a brief period come the nights when the young man's heart beateth against the fence-pickets, and the old man's foot beateth on the front door.

General Fitz John Porter, will probably be restored to his former rank as an army officer. If so, he will receive about $90,000 back pay in one installment.

—Fix up some of the dilapidated side-walks. In the wretched condition some of them are now, a man can peel his shin-bone without any exertion whatever.

—A surprise-party was given Tuesday evening at the residence of James McClellan, just over the bridge, and everybody had a fine large time. Cider—yum, yum.

—Bros. Kist, of the Butler Record, and Powell, of the Garrett Herald, have both called to see us since our last issue. Come again gentlemen; you are always welcome.

—Four tin pails and one dipper for one dollar, at Kiblinger & Co's.

—Hereafter the Courier office will occupy the whole of the second floor of the Odd Fellows' building. Editorial rooms first door to the right, at the head of the stairs.

—Our correspondence from St. Joe, Troy, Angola and Wilmington township was unavoidably crowded out last week. It all appears, however, on the first page this week.

—Paint your houses and barns, renovate your grape-vines, tear things up generally and make them up in good shape; and tell your next-door neighbor to go and do likewise.

—We congratulate Prof. Seiler upon the success of the entertainment given by the Auburn schools, last Saturday evening. Ensley's hall was never so much crowded before.

—Business in the boot and shoe line looks promising, with two new establishments just opened up. Glad to see it; bring on some more houses of various branches of business.

—It has been demonstrated that Ensley's hall will hold seven hundred persons. About that number attended the entertainment for the benefit of the schools, last Saturday evening.

Naples was visited by a storm, Feb. 25, which damaged the harbor to the amount of $500,000. Many such storms, it strikes us, would tear up the government; it would in this country.

—A finger billiardist manipulated the ivories for the benefit of the boys last Monday night. He drew quite a crowd, but not a wealthy or extravagant one, as he raked in only a few nickels.

—Prof. Seiler and his able corps of teachers deserve the thanks of the people of Auburn, for their untiring energy in preparing for the closing entertainment, given by the public schools.

—We take it all back. The hop given by the Neoteric club last week was not the closing one, for the boys are making preparations for the biggest frolic of the season, one week from to-night.

—The foolish man foldeth his hands and saith: "There is no trade; so why should I advertise?" But the wise man whoopeth it up lively in the newspapers, and verily he draweth customers from afar off.

—Look at the new advertisement of F. Fliegner, the enterprising Ft. Wayne furniture man, in this weeks Courier. Mr. Fliegner's business is daily increasing, and he knows what advertising amounts to.

—F. P. Copper, the gentlemanly and accommodating ticket agent, station agent, telegraph operator and general bossee at the Jackson depot, says he is up to his ears in business. Should think he would be.

—Monday night we observed three absent-minded fellows at the Eel River depot, with their arms entwined affectionately around one another, each trying to take the other home. This might perhaps be termed a 3-em-brace.

—In these days of queeriosities, nothing ought to surprise us; but when we see a milk-man's son fishing for minnows in the milk-cans, our faith in humanity is shaken and we are prone to remark, What are we coming to?

—Some melancholy individual is agitating the question, "Is life worth the living?" Just at this season, when the sap is running up, and every one ought to feel like a canary-bird, we conscientiously assert that we think it is.

—The bottom dropped out McQuiston & Ralston are selling a 16 oz plug of tobacco for 55c per plug. 13-3w —Those who have not visited Joe. Beugnot's saloon recently, would not recognize the place. It has been remodeled throughout.

—List of unclaimed letters remaining in the postoffice, at Auburn, Ind., April 5, 1879: Joseph Brechbille, Cathrine Gness, Joseph Heeter, S. Miller.

J. Rainier, P. M.

—Points for the Oliver Chilled plows at 45c. to close out present stock.

W. H. Kiblinger & Co.

—Remember that next Sunday is Easter, and do not disappoint the children who are expecting the periodical rabbit-egg. A few cents expended in this way will cause many joyous hearts.

—A new subscriber, in ordering the Courier a few days ago, closes the order by saying "I can neither borrow or steal the paper, and I must have it." The demand for the Courier is evidently increasing.

—Great credit is due to the people of Auburn, for the interest manifested in the welfare of the pupils who attend the public schools. The receipts of last evening will aid materially in the purchase of books of reference.

—Dr. Talmage wants to know "why men don't swear when they are alone." Don't reckon he ever sneaked up behind some man just in time to catch his remarks after having poked the lighted end of a cigar in his mouth.

—Examine our stock of Mens, Youths and Boys clothing, and compare prices with the best you can find, quantity, quality and prices to compete with anything in the city McQuiston & Ralstons. 13-3w

—The depot at the junction had a narrow escape from the firey fiend early last week. Some papers scattered around the flue overhead caught fire, but were discovered in time to prevent any material damage; and the insurance company is happy.

—Girls, watch for him. A Michigan man is making a systematic canvass of this portion of Hoosierdom, in search of some one to love him and cook for him and share his sorrows and joys. He will strike Auburn about next week. Take him in, somebody.

—Rinaldo McDowell, in company with his brother, went to Michigan a short time since in search of work, stopping at Sheridan for a few days, at which place Rinaldo was taken sick and died in a short time. He was brought home on Saturday, and was buried on Sunday last.

—Our old friend Will Craig, clerk of Wells county, and one of the proprietors of the Bluffton Banner, dropped in and spent a few moments with us one day last week. Mr. Craig is one of the active men connected with the construction of the narrow-guage railroad now building from Delphos, Ohio, west through Bluffton.

—Burglars entered the store of Mess. Miller & Getrost, on Tuesday night, by removing a glass from one of the back windows. The thieves appropriated the entire stock of silk handkerchiefs, three pairs of $5.00 boots, three hats and three suits of clothing, the total loss amounting to $50 or $75. No clue to the guilty parties.

—An experienced poultry man gives the following receipt for chicken cholera: For every 40 fouls take a piece of assafoetida the size of a hickory nut, break it into small pieces and mix it in with a pint of cornmeal; wet it thoroughly with boiling water and place it near the roosting place so that the chickens can eat it the first thing in the morning.

—Our enterprising manufacturer, Mr. James Anderson, is again in the market with a lot of first class carriages and buggies of his own manufacture, which he will sell at low figures, and on one year's time with approved security. He defies any shop in Northern Indiana to furnish better material than is used in his work. 9-9w

—The large painting—Goddess of Liberty, now on exhibition at Joe. Beugnot's saloon, will be given to the holder of the lucky number on the first day of July next. The picture including the frame is 4x7 feet in size, and a fine specimen of painting. Those who desire a chance to secure the picture, can get tickets at the saloon for 50 cents each.

—At the boot up-side down we always have sold, can yet, and WILL sell boots and shoes at 20 per cent. below any and all competition in the county. How is this: Men's solid two-buckle plow-shoe for $1, sold everywhere for $1.25. When you have learned the retail price of boots and shoes, come to the boot up-side down, and we'll sell you good goods at wholesale manufacturer's prices.

W. J. Austin & co.

Butler Township.

—Mr W. Byers is very low with consumption.

—Sugar making is a failure this spring.

—The summer schools have commenced.

—Cedar Creek wants the court-house removed to that place.

—A grand exhibition at Butler Center on next Saturday evening.

—Mr. T. S. Merica, who was hurt recently by the falling of a tree, will soon be able to go to work again.

It is a fact.

It is a fact that Dr. Price's Special Flavoring Extracts of Lemon, Vanilla, Orange, Rose, Nectarine, Almond, etc., are the finest flavors for cakes, puddings, ices, creams and pastry, that can be made.

Farmers Attention.

If you want fruit trees, I will furnish No 1 stock at low prices. Trees delivered the same day they are taken out of the ground. Orders taken at any time.

14-3w S. U. Tarney.

Strictly Pure.

It is well known that while Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder has been made for many years without reducing its standard of perfect purity, there is not another baking powder in the market that can stand the test for purity. Chemists and physicians use Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder in their own families.

Ask Yourself these Questions.

Are you a despondent sufferer from Sick Headache, Habitual Costiveness, Palpitation of the Heart? Have you Dizziness of the Head? Is your Nervous System depressed? Does your Blood circulate badly? Have you a Cough? Low Spirits? Coming up of the food after eating? &c., &c. All of these and much more are the direct results of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint and Indigestion. Green's August Flower is now acknowledged by all Druggists to be a positive cure. 2,400,000 bottles were given away in the U. S. through Druggists to the people as a trial. Two doses will satisfy any person of its wonderful quality in curing all forms of Indigestion. Sample bottles 10 cts. Regular size 75 cts. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

'Stunning' Styles.

Strangers visiting Ft. Wayne this spring should by all means not neglect to visit A. S. Lauferty & Co's., better known as the C. O. D. Clothers, and universally acknowledged as the one price, square dealers, unsurpassable nobby clothiers, and dealers in the best made garments for the least money. Their large and Commodious Establishment (presided over by Lauferty himself, assisted by a host of as gentlemanly and pleasant assistants as one can wish to meet,) is situated at No. 9 East Main St., exactly opposite the north door of the court house. You can find there the most complete, well made assortment of clothing for old men, for middle-aged men, for young men, for boys for children, in fact, for the entire male sex, of any size, shape or descsiption, at prices within the reach of all. Beyond doubt, it is the place where one feels at home the moment he enters, and never leaves Unsuited or Dissatisfied. Their line of furnishing goods, hats, caps, trunks and valises is in itself simply an immense department. Remember the place,

THE TOKEN.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

Clad in purple, he sat in his palace,
  A powerful King, in the days of old;
They brought him wine in a beautiful chalice,
  Whose gems were crusted in beaten gold.

"Who hath jewels like mine?" demanded
  The boastful monarch; and straightway then
Through his men-at-arms, who at once disbanded,
  Came one who looked like the man of men.

He came in proudly and held up a jewel,
  Held it with both hands over his head;
Its light was lovely, its light was cruel;
  But, cruel or lovely, the light was red.

It shot out sparkles; it was a glory,
  A terrible splendor, a blaze of fire;
No one sight like it, in song or story,
  For who had that had his soul's desire!

Its brightness shone over land and ocean,
  Far-reaching—a dazzling, blinding light;
Creating wonder and strange devotion,
  A sense of love and the sense of might.

"Who hath jewels like thine?" demanded
  This man of men. "Look at my great gem!
It grew where the rivers are golden-sanded,
  With others—it does not compare with them!

"I say to thee, monarch, it is a token
  Of the masters, that ever on earth remain;
And if by chance any part is broken,
  It is nothing less, but is whole again."

Thus in Gallic Latin—your Southey will show it—
  Two hundred and fifty years ago,
Wrote the great de Thou of an early poet;
  But what the meaning he did not know.

I know his secret, without his learning;
  I have divined it by my deep art;
It is only dark to the undiscerning—
  This parable of the poet's heart!

EDITH'S BROOCH.

"There, that's enough, young woman," said the harsh voice of Mr. Garnet, the jeweler, as a young and timid female still lingered near his counter. "I have made you the offer. If you like to take it, well and good; if not, you had better be off at once."

Still the girl hesitated.

"Can you not do any more for me? The brooch is so very valuable. It has been prized as one which is extremely rare," she pleaded.

"My good girl, do be reasonable. I have given my ultimatum. I never make two prices," said Mr. Garnet, sharply. "I can waste no more time on you."

And the jeweler turned from the young lady—for lady she was, in all her look and attitude and tone—to a customer who had just entered the shop.

"Is my pin finished yet?" he inquired.

And Mr. Garnet turned off to a neighboring drawer to bring the trinket forth from its hiding-place.

"There it is, Mr. Trevaux. I hope it will prove all satisfactory, sir," was the civil reply, as the jeweler brought it to the counter. "It was a tiresome job, and we shall be obliged to charge accordingly. It will be $40, sir."

Mr. Trevaux drew out his purse, and paid the money without further comment.

But, as he did so, his glance fell on the splendid diamond-and-ruby brooch that was still reposing on the counter near its shrinking mistress, and then it turned on the young lady herself with keen though not attentive observation.

Here was a face and figure that could well bear inspection.

Paul's gaze furtively rested on her winning charms, while the jeweler wrapped up the beautiful breast-pin that had been so costly in its repair.

Then the young man lounged carelessly about the shop, examining its precious contents, and now and then asking the price of the tempting articles, while Edith Montrose once again spoke to Mr. Garnet, in a low, eager tone.

"The brooch is worth $500, I have often heard. I will be content with $300. Can you not give it to me? Even then it is a great loss," she added plaintively.

Mr. Garnet hummed and hawed, looked again at the jewel, and again appeared to give way.

"Well, well, I always was rather soft when youth and beauty were in the case. I expect I shall lose; but it cannot be helped. I will give you the money. There, write this receipt and your name and address, and it shall be a bargain."

Edith sighed deeply, but there was no alternative; a young sister and an invalid brother depended on her for support.

Was it for her to prefer a trinket, however valuable, to their comfort and welfare?

The thought emboldened her to conquer feminine repugnance to such a sacrifice.

The pen was seized and the acquittance given during the brief absence of the jeweler.

But as he returned to his post with the bank notes another customer entered, followed by a large Newfoundland dog, who made up to Edith and fawned upon her with singular marks of affection; while his master began to inquire for the articles that he required from the store.

"Can I go? Will you please give me that sum?" faltered Edith in a low tone, as the stranger deliberately turned over the things he had demanded to be shown.

Mr. Garnet turned sharply round, gave the girl the bank-notes, and then devoted himself to his more profitable customer.

Meanwhile, Edith Montrose left the shop, and was followed for some distance by Paul Trevaux, though she was too much engaged with her own thoughts to observe his movements, or perhaps his very existence.

"What kind of brooch were you wanting, Mr. St. Croix?" asked the jeweler of his remaining customer. "I have not long since purchased one of exceeding value and beauty, which I should like to show you."

Mr. Garnet looked round to point out the jewel in question; but it was not visible. He searched the jewel-cases, the papers, and the inkstand from which Edith had taken the pen; but in vain.

The brooch had vanished. No trace of it could be found, and Mr. Garnet's ire was both loud and deep.

"The young minx. Yes, there can be no doubt of it! I am seldom so utterly befooled. But who could have believed such a thing? She really looked like a lady. Well, she shall suffer for it, cost what it will. I'll have no mercy. Mr. St. Croix, now am I not justified? You are witness. Look here at this receipt."

And he displayed the graceful handwriting of his young client to Mr. St. Croix's stern eyes.

"A trick, of course. You never can be up to them; they have as many disguises as a detective," he returned. "However, I shall be very happy to bear witness in the matter, Mr. Garnet," he added, pocketing the jewels which he had just purchased from Mr. Garnet's store, leaving the jeweler to the indulgence of his wrath.

* * * * *

"Young woman, we have a warrant against you. You must come with us," said two ferocious-looking individuals, or, at least, they had a most formidable appearance in the eyes of the poor girl and her invalid brother as they entered their humble apartment.

"For what? There must be some mistake," faltered the girl, shrinkingly.

"Not at all. We never make mistakes. Ain't your name Edith Montrose?" they asked, sharply.

The girl bowed her head.

"Ah! yes; it's all right. And weren't you in the shop of Mr. Garnet yesterday, jeweler, in Old Bond street?" was the next query.

And again the assent was mutely given.

"Very well. Then you're the right person; and if you don't choose to give up the brooch you stole we must take you off at once to prison," was the reply.

"I have no brooch. It is false! I sold it," exclaimed the girl, with flashing indignation in her eyes and face.

"Ha, ha! We know what all that means. We must search the house if you are still obstinate, young lady," returned the elder man.

"There are but three rooms on this floor that belong to me. I and my brother and sister lodge here," she replied, sadly. "My brother is in one of the rooms. He is ill. Please do not shock him by such a dreadful falsehood," she went on presently.

"That's your look-out; not ours. You should not have done it," the man answered, gruffly.

But the other whispered a few words to him that somewhat modified his hardness, and, when they pursued their search to the invalid's room, they so far softened their manner as to refrain from fully explaining their errand to the astonished Cecil.

"Well—well; it's very cleverly hidden, but you'll be made to turn it out, young lady," said the official. "You must come with us, and, if you choose to tell your sick lad there not to expect you back, it will, perhaps, save some trouble."

Poor Edith shivered, but her love for the suffering Cecil prevailed over her woman's fears, and she quietly told him she might have to give some evidence about a lost brooch, and that the younger sister Mabel would take her place in his room. And, with this last brave attempt to conceal her suffering, she departed with her rough escort to the degrading destination of the Police Court.

The ordeal there was brief enough. There was no defense; but still only presumptive proof of her guilt. So a remand, and a humane permission to occupy a room under surveillance instead of going to a common prison, was given by the indulgence of the bewildered and doubting magistrate.

* * * * * * * *

"Miss Montrose, I have obtained leave to see you. I trust you will pardon the liberty I am taking in this self-introduction, and in obtaining permission to take up your case," said a gentleman, who had just been announced to the young prisoner in the rough-and-ready style of her jailer.

And Paul Trevaux stood before her, with a frank yet respectful air that was adapted to win at once her confidence and her respect.

"You are very kind, but I do not know you," she said, timidly. "I have no friends to help me to prove my innocence, and it is unfair to expect a stranger to believe when proof is so strong against me."

"Never mind whether it is fair or not," he replied, smiling. "It is enough that I do trust you as I would myself, and that, being a budding barrister, I intend to win laurels in vindicating you triumphantly as an innocent lady. Will you allow such presumption?"

Edith's eyes filled with tears for the first time since her misfortunes.

"You are indeed good and kind," she said, "and I do assure you from my very heart that I am innocent—quite guiltless of the theft;" and her color rose indignantly at the degrading word. "No; I sold the brooch in question to Mr. Garnet, and received the money, and left the jewel, while he was engaged with another gentleman—the one with a large dog, I mean."

"And are you sure the brooch was on the counter then?" he asked.

"Quite sure," she replied, and then the subject dropped, and the conversation turned on other topics, and Paul heard, without much difficulty, the sad story of the young girl's early troubles; how she and her brother and sister had been left orphans, and that all her energies had been taxed to the utmost to meet the demands on her courage and her time by such a burden.

And, though she only distantly alluded to any pecuniary difficulties, the very fact of parting with so valuable a family jewel was enough to prove the straits in which they had fallen.

Paul lingered till the last moment of his time, and then departed, more than before convinced of the innocence of his fair client, and equally conscious that she appeared to him most lovely and fascinating.

* * * * * * * *

"Pray, Mr. Trevaux, what witnesses have you to call in defense of the prisoner?" asked the magistrate, in an accent of severity that perhaps covered the dangerous yearnings of indulgence in his heart.

"Simply Mr. St. Croix and his dog," replied the young man, calmly. "I believe they are both in court, and, if I can extract no information from them, I can only plead absence of any real proof for my client."

There was a general buzz as the large Newfoundland appeared by the side of his master, and looked round the crowded court with dignified inquisitiveness. But, when his eyes fell on Edith, the creature could scarcely be restrained from rushing to her to display the strange regard he had conceived for her.

"Mr. St. Croix," said Paul, calmly, "may I ask if you have examined your dress, as you wore it on the day when the brooch was lost—I mean, so as to make it absolutely certain it cannot have been carried off by you in ignorance. Of course, I distinctly mean that the trinket might have clung to some part of your garment while you were utterly unconscious of its very existence, and I am sure, for this young lady's sake, you will pardon the question."

"It is impossible. I have worn them ever since the day. I must have detected such an involuntary theft had it been committed," replied Mr. St. Croix, gravely.

"And your dog! may I venture—or will you kindly undertake to pass this comb through his hair?" resumed the barrister.

There was a general laugh in court; but Paul was not to be turned from his purpose.

He came forward, and passed the comb through Neptune's thick coat of hair without effect. But just when a cry of derisive contempt was uttered by Mr. Garnet there was a sharp, light sound on the floor of the court.

The missing brooch had become entangled in the innermost recesses of the shaggy mane, just below his broad leathern collar, and Neptune stood convicted of felony.

But he was not only freely shielded from punishment by a pardon, but some few months afterwards he was made a wedding present to Mrs. Paul Trevaux, nee Edith Montrose.

My Bird-House.

My bird-house is not my own invention. I read in some newspaper that an oyster-keg made a good bird-house, and an oyster-keg is what you must have in the first place. Most of you know what these kegs are, and can easily get one from some store or some oyster-man. Leave the heads in, and stop up the bung-hole; then cut a round hole, two inches in diameter, in the side, about two inches from the end you design for the floor of your house, and nail this end firmly to a square piece of board large enough to project a couple of inches all round, like a little platform. Next, cover the outside of the keg with pieces of rough bark. If you have a wood-pile to go to, you can probably find logs from which you can pry off wide, curving pieces that will go half round your little house; but if not, you must get smaller bits from trees in the woods, and trim them with a knife to fit side by side; no matter if the joinings are not very close, when the house is fastened on some arbor or trellis, no eyes but the birds' can possibly see the crevices, and they are not critical, bright as they are. Use small brads for nailing on the bark, and, if driven in a little on the slant, they will hold the bark more securely. For a roof, nail two wide strips of bark to the upper rim of the keg in such a position that their upper edges will meet to form a gable just in the middle above the door. It is not necessary to have this roof water-tight, because the head of the keg will keep out the rain; trim off the upper edges of the bark roof-sides so that they will meet closely, but, if they do not stay together well, bore a few holes and take several stitches with fine wire, and your work will be better.

The house will look prettier if you make the roof both wide and deep, giving what, in a real house, would be called "overhanging eaves."

Last of all, fill up the open spaces under the gables with bits of bark trimmed to fit, and nailed to the sides of the keg. Now, your bird-house is complete! Nail it on the top of the grape arbor, or in the crotch of a tree, and hang a bit of cotton-wool and a few hairs about the door, which the birds will read as we read the sign "To let," and see if you do not have wrens and blue-birds coming to look at the vacant house, and, at last, some nice little couple "concluding to rent it for the summer."

No matter if your house is not ready until late in the season. I do not think all the birds get to housekeeping before June, and you know often they build more than one nest in the course of the summer; so, unless there are too many cats about, I think you may be pretty sure of a tenant.

When I made my little house, I had no idea it would last more than one summer, but it has weathered the storms of four winters and still looks well. Every spring the wrens and blue-birds squabble and fight for possession of it—the wrens, I am sorry to say, always coming off conquerors! And every spring I watch the nest-building from my window with great satisfaction.—"O'B.," in St. Nicholas for April.

Chinese Schools.

The remarkable example of the eccentricity of the Chinese turn of mind is noticeable in their schools, where, instead of silence being inculcated, as might naturally be considered so essential, every child is expected to bawl out the lesson that he is committing to memory at the top of his voice; and the babel which is the result may be more easily imagined than described. When a Chinese boy goes up to repeat his lesson, he does not stand facing his tutor, but turns his back upon him, and hence repeating a lesson goes by the familiar name of "backing" it. This method of recitation has an excellent effect in keeping the boy on the qui vive to avoid mistakes, for no sooner does he commit one than he is called to recollection by a smart tap on the closely-shaven pate, from the metal of a long tobacco-pipe which every pedagogue carries about him.

A TEXAS TRAGEDY.

A Well-Known Actor Murdered by a Desperado.

[Marshall (Texas) Cor. Chicago Times.]

The members of the Warde-Barrymore combination went to the depot to take the train going north, on the way out of the State, after an engagement of several weeks in the principal cities of Texas. Maurice Barrymore, B. C. Porter and Miss Josephine Baker went into the restaurant adjoining the waiting-room to get coffee and lunch. In the rear of the room is a saloon, with the door open between. James Currie, a Texas Pacific railroad detective, was seated alone in the saloon where he could see those in the restaurant. Shortly after the entrance of the above-named persons, Currie, in a loud voice, made an insulting remark about Miss Baker.

Barrymore replied: "You are mistaken there; this lady is under our protection. You must not insult her," and added, noticing Currie's evident intoxication: "We don't want to have any trouble with you."

Currie rose to his feet, and, advancing, said: "Will you take it up?"

Barrymore answered: "No; we don't want to take it up; we are both unarmed. Leave us alone."

Currie walked nearer, and, with the words, "I don't like to be talked to this way," drew a six-shooter and fired, the ball passing through Barrymore's left arm and through the upper part of his chest, coming out below the shoulder at the back.

At this Porter stepped forward, and, placing his hand on Currie's shoulder, said: "Come, now, you've had enough of this."

With an oath Currie threw the revolver down against Porter's body and fired, the ball passing through his abdomen and coming out at the back. A bystander came in, and Currie fired at him, but missed. Porter sank to the floor in an unconscious condition. He lived fifty minutes. Barrymore's wound is fearful, but is not considered dangerous. After the shooting Currie drew a second revolver, and, with one at full cock in each hand, defied arrest. There had been no witnesses to the affair except the bar-keeper and the lady. A policeman, an old man without arms, entered soon after, when Currie put up his revolvers, and quietly submitted to arrest.

Excitement over the affair grew in intensity until the lynching of Currie by the enraged populace seemed probable. It is regarded as the most damnable murder that has taken place in Texas for many years, and, it is thought, will hurt the State very much. The combination is still at Marshall. Porter's remains were placed in a casket and will be sent North. Barrymore's condition at last reports was favorable.

Currie has lived in Texas several years. He was formerly a scout with Custer, and lived in Kansas, where he killed two men. He was engaged by the Texas Pacific as a detective in working up the cases of Sam Bass' gang of train-robbers, and was lately a private detective on the road. He is large, powerfully built, and a regular rough-and-ready of the frontier, and, when in liquor, quarrelsome and overbearing.

Spring Fashions.

Skirts are beautifully short.

Poke bonnets are fashionable.

English round hats have larger crowns.

Turbans are worn both in and out doors.

Novelties in side sachels are in demand.

Both high and low turban caps are fashionable.

Black chip is the favorite bonnet for all occasions.

The square chuddah is the favorite breakfast shawl.

Gloves are long, reaching to the elbow for full evening toilet.

Elbow sleeves are seen on ball and evening reception dresses.

Waistcoats are as often made to wear over the basque as under it.

New parasols have flatter tops than the canopy ones of last summer.

Panier scarfs and draperies appear on all Paris dresses brought over this spring.

Caps made of silk handkerchiefs, in turban or Normandy form, are much worn.

Silk handkerchiefs, in Oriental design and colors, are preferred for dressy breakfast-caps.

Rhine pebble buttons look like diamonds at night. The prices vary from 75 cents a dozen up.

French chips are brought out in shades of color to match costumes, such as pale blue, dark blue, tan, chamois, gray, beige, brown and dark green.

Diamond ribbon collar necklaces are the fashion of the passing moment, set in pavé style, and with clasps that make them available either for a pair of bracelets or for a necklace.

The novelty in spring bonnets is of soft chip, or Tuscan straw, with a large brim of the same dimensions all around; this brim the milliners indent to suit the face of the wearer.

A new fancy that will probably "take" is to face the skirts of dressy costumes with red silk, under which the lace balayeuse is basted, making a very pretty and striking dress effect.

The Electric Light—Is It a Failure?

For some time nothing has been heard from Mr. Edison of his progress in dividing and cheapening the electric light. For some months no addition has been made to the experimental lights which are kept burning rather as advertisements than as practical illuminators. The corridor of the Equitable building continues to be lighted with electricity, but the example set there has not been followed. Almost the only serious effort made on this side of the ocean to supersede gas by electricity for the usual purposes of a light was that made in the Assembly Chamber of the new Capitol at Albany. The Commissioners were understood to be anxious to introduce the new illuminator if its practicability could only be proven, and a single evening session successfully held without the aid of gaslight would greatly have encouraged the development of the new industry. It was announced that one inventor after another had privately exhibited his apparatus in the new chamber, and for days at a time had had opportunity to study, and if he could to overcome the difficulties of successfully lighting a room in which the problem was much simpler than usual. Yet not only has the electric light not been used for a single session, but none of the inventors or patentees have risked a single public exhibition of his device. The inference is that the light, in all the forms in which it has hitherto been introduced here, is a failure even for the purpose of lighting a single great apartment for two or three hours. Much more is there reason to believe that an attempt to apply it to domestic purposes, where it must be much further subdivided, would be a failure.—New York Sun.

HYGIENE.

Village Boards of Health.

Writing in Scribner for April of Dr. Roosa's recent address before the New York State Medical Society on the "Relations of the Medical Profession to the State," Dr. Holland thus discusses a very important topic:

Dr. Roosa very wisely says that there should be a Board of Health in every county and every town, and that there should be no man upon it who has not a scientific, medical, or legal education. He furthermore says that "not a schoolhouse, not a jail, not a hospital, not a sewer, should be built unless competent sanitary advice, with power to enforce it, be given." This is all right, as far as it goes, but it does not go half far enough. The truth is that every private house that goes up should be built under public sanitary supervision. Men are dying in New York every day because houses are built improperly. The arrangements for plumbing and ventilation are not only incompetent, but utterly vicious and murderous. Men put up buildings all over the country just as they please. We have built houses for human dwellings, and we have never yet been questioned by any public officer as to how many fatal traps we had set for human life. House poisoning has now become the most common form of poisoning. Diphtheria, pneumonia, and typhoid fever are the constant daily demonstration of vicious modes of building, and there is no authority, apparently, to prevent the formation of the sources of these diseases. A builder puts up a block, and offers his houses for sale. The buyer sees everything fair, for the sources of disease are covered from sight, but he moves in, and one after another of his family sickens and dies, and he learns, at last, that he has dealt with a criminal, and that the municipality or the State has afforded him no protection.

The truth is that we not only need to have Boards of Health established in many places where they are not, but we need to have their powers much enlarged where they exist. No one, we suppose, can doubt the great usefulness of our New York Board of Health, but if they could be armed with powers that would enable them to act more directly upon the prevention of disease they could be much more useful. If they could have authority to dictate the plumbing and ventilation of every structure, private as well as public, erected in this city, they could save the city a large percentage of its cruelist mortality. If they could have the control of the cleaning of the streets, does anyone doubt that they would greatly improve the health of the city? We talk about the adulteration of food as if that were a great thing, and our Board of Health busies itself about it in the absence of other work, but the adulteration, the absolute poisoning, of the air we breathe, is of amost infinitely more importance.

Dr. Roosa speaks of what is done in the way of preventive medicine by our wise system of quarantine, by which the city has been saved from destructive epidemics. With our yellow-fever lesson of last year fresh in memory, it really seems as if towns should learn something. There is no question that all these epidemics become fatal in the degree in which the air is vitiated by poisonous odors. When yellow fever or cholera visits a place, it becomes a terrible or a mild visitation, according to the conditions which it finds. If it finds a people already poisoned with foul streets and bad drainage, it finds food for a great and grave mortality. If it finds a place where everything is pure and sweet, it does not stay long or work such mischief. There are some States which have a Board of Health, or may have one in every town, armed with a considerable amount of power—with the power, at least, of holding inquests on private premises, and determining what shall be done to remedy evils; but what we really want most is a wider power of prevention, such as shall make it incumbent upon every builder to secure the approval of such a board before he can live in his house himself, or offer it for for sale or rent.

Maj. Andre.

In a lecture before the Workmen's Club and Institute Union, in London, the other day, Dean Stanley spoke of Maj. Andre. The memory of this young officer, he thought, was hardly so well preserved in England as it was in America. The story of Maj. Andre's striking adventures and their tragic conclusion was graphically narrated in the lecture. Every American, said the Dean, who saw Maj. Andre, at the time of his trial and up to the moment of his execution, was so captivated with his courage and his chivalrous behavior that, if they had allowed their feelings to overcome their sense of duty to their country's cause, they would certainly have granted his request that he might be executed as a soldier, if they had not released him altogether. When he (the Dean) was in America it was suggested to him that he should bring back a wreath of leaves from the banks of the Hudson river, which were then in all the extraordinary colors which they bear in the fall, and this wreath, which was taken from maple and oak trees overlooking the spot of Maj. Andre's death, he had brought back and placed above the tomb in the Abbey, where he trusted it would long remain as a token of the kindly feelings that might be called forth by such tragic events.

THE ELEVENTH HOUR.

BY ANNA L. RUTH.

Whist, sir! Would ye plase to speak aisy,
  And sit ye down there by the dure?
She sleeps, sir, so light and so restless,
  She hears every step on the flure.
What ails her? God knows! She's been weakly
  For months, and the heat drives her wild;
The summer has wasted and worn her
  Till she's only the ghost of a child.

All I have? Yes, she is, and God help me!
  I'd three little darlints beside,
As purty as iver ye see, sir,
  But wan by wan drooped like, and died.
What was it that tuk them, ye're asking?
  Why, poverty, sure; and, no doubt,
They perished for food and fresh air, sir,
  Like flowers dried up in a drought.

'Twas dreadful to lose them? Ah, was it!
  It seemed like my heart-strings would break!
But there's days when wid want and wid sorrow,
  I'm thankful they're gone, for their sake.
Their father? well, sir, saints forgive me!
  It's a foul tongue that lowers its own!
But, what wid the strikes and the liquor,
  I'd better be strugglin' alone.

Do I want to kape this wan? The darlint!
  The last and dearest of all!
Shure you're niver a father yourself, sir,
  Or you wouldn't be askin' at all.
What is that? Milk and food for the baby!
  A docther and medicine free!
You're huntin' out all the sick children,
  An' poor, toilin' mothers, like me!

God bless you and thim that have sent you!
  A new life you've given me, so,
Shure, sir; won't you look in the cradle
  At the colleen you've saved, 'fore you go?
O, mother o' mercies! have pity!
  O, darlint, why couldn't you wait!
Dead! dead! an' the help in the dure way!
  Too late! O, my baby! Too late!

THE AUBURN COURIER.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

The Bride's Story.

When I was but a country lass, now fifteen years ago,
I lived where flowed the Overpeck through meadows wide and low;
'Twas first, when skies were bending blue and blossoms blowing free,
I saw the ragged little boy who went to school with me.

His homespun coat was frayed and worn, with patches covered o'er;
His hat—oh, such a hat as that was never seen before!
The boys and girls, when first he came, they shouted in their glee,
And jeered the little ragged boy who went to school with me.

His father was a laboring man, and mine was highly born;
Our people held both him and his in great contempt and scorn—
They said I should not stoop to own a playmate such as he,
The bright-eyed, ragged little boy who went to school with me.

For years they had forgotten him, but when again we met,
His look, his voice, his gentle ways remained in memory yet;
They saw alone the man of mark, but I could only see
The bright-eyed, ragged little boy who went to school with me.

He had remembered me, it seemed, as I remembered him;
Nor time nor honors in his mind, the cherished past could dim;
Young love had grown to older love, and so to-day, you see,
I wed the little ragged boy who went to school with me.

A Royal and a Player Queen.

At one of the royal balls, the queen and Madame Ristori were seen seated on the sofa talking pleasantly together, in the maccari-room. It was a fine chance to compare two royalties. Each was perfect after her own kind. Ristori was just as we have seen her on the stage personating a queen, lofty and noble. Marguerite of Savoy was equally regal, but with a difference. Her majesty of Italy has changed a good deal since she came to the throne. She stands more upon her rank, is not so universally gracious, and, when little matters of etiquette go awry, she shows her dissatisfaction. The guests were late in arriving at the second ball; the royal party reached the salon before all the guests had arrived, so when the rest of them came in, she did not salute them, but turned and talked to the ladies of her court. She is not so popular as queen as she was as princess. Her dress at the third ball was delicate rose satin, covered all over with splendid lace; around the low neck of the body was a deep fringe of brilliant diamonds; the necklace was a superb one of large sapphires, emeralds, and diamonds, and the diadem was the same.—Naples Letter.

The Matter with Women's Shoes.

Let me give you the result of my observation and thought: The sole is too narrow! My friend, Mrs. C., in reading the chapter in Our Girls, devoted to "Boots and Shoes," came to say that, although she was a great sufferer from corns and a general sore and crippled condition of feet, her shoes were nevertheless enormous,—twice as large as her feet. She wished I would see if it was not so. I examined the shoes, and agreed with her that they were too large. As she stepped, it was doubtless true, as she said, that her foot rocked over, first on this side and then on that. Now it pressed over on the outside, rubbing down over the edge of the sole and touching the ground, and perhaps, if the ground was at all uneven, on the very next step her boot would rock over on the other side of the sole. Such friction between the little toe and the big toe joints against the upper leather must inevitably produce corns. I think the majority of shoes are too large.

Mrs. C. wished me to accompany her to the shoemaker's and see what I could do for her relief, for really life was becoming a torture. We went to her own shoemaker. Mrs. C. hobbled to a seat and declared:

"I wo'nt try to walk again, there!"

Her shoe was removed, and Mr. Shoemaker marked around her foot, while she was standing upon it. We measured the mark and found that was exactly four inches. That was the width of her foot when she stepped on it without a shoe. Then we measured the sole of the shoe she had been wearing, and found it two and a half inches. Here was the secret of the whole trouble.

A pair of shoes were made for her at once with soles four inches broad.

Now she can walk for hours without a pain in her feet.

There are millions of poor sufferers in the country, who are limping and hobbling through the world, who might be perfectly relieved and cured by the same means.—Dr. Dio Lewis.

Escorts to Order.

Ladies have often complained that they were deterred from the many enjoyments by the custom which forbids them to go out after dark without a male escort. Husbands are sometimes busy and sometimes otherwise engaged; beaux have a faculty of appearing at the wrong times, and inviting objects of their attentions to the wrong places, that is, to the places they are least anxious to attend. Until a complete understanding is arrived at as to future relation, most grown ladies are disinclined to ask to be asked, and consequently often remain at home when they most want to go out. To relieve ladies from this embarrassment, the fashion has been inaugurated in New York of hiring escorts. An Eastern paper describes the process:

When a lady, otherwise without an escort, wishes some one to escort her to a theater, she indicates as much on the call-bell connecting with the nearest district telegraph office. Her name and address are taken there, and word is telegraphed to the central office for an escort. The one who answers the summons is given the address and a letter of introduction, and accompanies the applicant to whatever theater she desires. The escort pays for the car fare and tickets from the money that his newly-made friend has given him. He attends her back to the hotel and receives two dollars for his services. This custom of employing escorts has become a regular practice, and appears to be growing in favor.

In a majority of cases it is said the men employed for escort duty are in the service of the telegraph company during the day. The instinct of business would suggest to the managers of these companies to send only respectable men. If the escort happens to be reasonably young and correspondingly good looking, he is more likely to be frequently wanted. It is understood that they are not serving in the capacity of footmen, but for the night as equals. They sit beside the lady during the performance, and are expected so be as agreeable as they can. They are, in fact, escorts to order, but for the time escorts in the full sense of the term, except that the lady bears the expense. It is needless to add, that careful papas who have young and impulsive daughters on their hands do not avail themselves of the new fashion to any extent.

A Trick in Dressing.

A Boston correspondent of a western paper has slandered some of the society people of this city: "There is a certain fashionable modiste up town who has among her customers a large number of ladies of our 'very best society.' Carriages are continually before her door, and such is her success in business that she is the envy of the throng of less successful modistes who cannot see how she does it!" This is because they do not understand the double role she plays. Very many of the large flattops in which elegant costumes are sent home come back to the dressmaker a few days later; but of course that is all right—changes are needed. But when the changes are made, the costumes go out again to different addresses from the first ones, and again they come back. In fact, the principle business done here is that of letting costumes for balls, weddings and other affairs. Even black silk visiting dresses and street suits may be hired and are especially made use of by the ladies who are going on visits for a few weeks for other cities or the sea shore. But the business is so carefully arranged that nobody finds it out, and even the ladies who patronize the establishment seldom see their dresses worn by anyone else, for the madame always keeps strict memoranda of the places where the dresses have been worn, and never lets a costume go twice into the same circle of society; besides such alterations are made every time a dress comes back, that it would not be very easily recognized. Considering the secrecy maintained regarding this branch of the business done here, it is rather surprising how the madame ever secured the large list of patrons whose names are on her book. Think what a fluttering there would be should these private books be by any accident made public!"

"Pretty Fanny Carter."

Celia Logan writes to the Cincinnati Enquirer: The most prominent American lady now in society in London—putting out of the count those wonderfully lucky creatures, who have married English noblemen, like the Viscountess Mandeville—is Mrs. Ronalds, with whose name the leaders of your haut ton are familiar. What a strange career has been hers! Twenty years ago she was pretty Fanny Carter, of Boston, whom nobody knew. Her social status was nil. But at a Newport season she captured the heart of the rich Peter Lorillard Ronalds, and the next winter, as Mrs. "Pierre" Ronalds, she was driving imperial Paris fairly wild with her beauty, her sauciness, her magnificent voice, her wonderful skill as a skater. The mot is so old that it has now become a classic: "How did Mrs. Ronalds get to the Tuileries? She skated there." I believe it is really a fact that she and the emperor struck up a sparking acquaintance on the ice without an introduction, and that one night when he asked her to let him take her hand as they went skating down a sloping bank, she said she would if he'd invite her to the "Little Mondays of the empress." For many seasons she was the greatest lion Paris circles could boast, and held her own even with the Princess Metternich, whose wit was so unparalleled, and the Countess de Castiglione, whose beauty was almost superhuman. But Mrs. Ronalds had not only beauty—she had a magnificent soprano voice, and after her marriage she had it cultivated until it reached a point of perfection unequalled save by that of one or two voices of the leading prima donna on the operatic stage. Such talent commands a position in society, and it is probable that if Mrs. Ronalds had not skated to the Tuileries she would have sung her way there sooner or later. In the zenith of her success in Paris, she brought over her sister from Boston, also a very beautiful girl, though not so handsome as Mrs. Ronalds. The sisters were invited everywhere, but the younger did not live long to enjoy her triumphs. Her death was Mrs. Ronald's first great sorrow, but after that many trials and disturbances came, which finally culminated in a divorce, and, unless I have been grossly misinformed, there followed an entire taboo from New York society, which at one time made much of her, though Boston never did. After all this, it seems odd to see her again on the topmost wave of social success in London. She has had a splendid list of visits in the choicest country houses this winter, and was at Luton Hoo when the Prince of Wales was there. Lady Molesworth, one of the ladies of the ton, has taken Mrs. Ronalds up, and the Duchess of Manchester, mother-in-law of the Viscountess Mandeville (Miss Ynaga, of New York), also makes a great deal of her, and the consequence is that hardly a day passes that Mrs. Ronald's name is not seen forming one of the list of aristocratic guests present at some grand dinner or some exclusive ball. Her beauty, for those who remember her early days in Paris, as I do, is somewhat "gone off" as they say here; nevertheless, she is still handsome, so much so that that hackneyed title, La belle Americaine, is often applied to her. Her voice was never in fairer condition than now, and her manners have gained an added charm with the years. Her former husband, "Pete" Ronalds, is also in London. I sometimes see him, clad in deep mourning, and looking rather sad. I believe he goes into no society from choice, but is greatly interested in horses and racing. Neither he nor she has remarried.

Fashion Notes.

THE "princesse polonaise" is permanently fastened upon a cambric skirt, with pleatings at the foot.

SKIRTS are noticeably short in front, giving an excellent opportunity to exhibit fine hose and handsome slippers.

FANCY modes are chiefly confined to full dress toilets. The surplice and pompadour waists are preferred for party wear.

BUTTONS on spring costumes may be either large or small, but there cannot be too many of them, whatever may be their size.

DRESSY aprons of muslin are fashionable for home toilettes; they are trimmed with lace and bows of ribbon, and the one pocket is ornamented with a bow.

CREAM and ivory white (with a slight yellow tinge), will be replaced the coming season by lead white, a blue-gray shade. This is already shown in tulle and tarlatan.

GARNET, mulberry and claret are the favorite colors for dress-goods, and the latest styles all tend to the full panier, which will undoubtedly be greatly enlarged next season, if hoops are not actually revived.

AN entirely new combination for scarf pins, belt clasps and pins for the hair is that of garnet, blue and crystal glass. Women will soon be decked out in as gorgeous jewels as the savage delights to wear.

COMBINATIONS of colors are very striking in rich fabrics. Pomegranate hues associated with sulphur tints produce a fascinating picture by strong gaslight. Dark garnet and silver blue, also old gold and royal purple, are lively mixtures. Black velvet, upon which are figures of scarlet and blue, is a novel dress material.

SOME summer dresses, for evening wear, will be made entirely of light striped silk without combination with any other material, their only relief being a profusion of black ribbon and a little lace. They are tasteful and elegant, and possess the advantage of durability of style.

THE panier basques are seen on many short dresses of muslin, or of wool or silk. Most of these are simply cut quite long and caught up in pleats in the side seams to make the hips looks large; a bouffant overskirt is used with these. There are also panier polonaises that afford excellent suggestions to ladies who wish to remodel the long polonaises worn last year.

THE newest cottage bonnets, after clasping the head closely, roll upward in the brim just above the forehead and low down behind the crown. The roll is scarcely an inch deep, yet when covered with shirred satin it makes the small bonnet much more dressy than were the closer fronts worn during the winter. The best Parisian milliners have sent out this new shape in the most expensive braids, trimmed with the richest materials used this season.

The Double Death.

Many extraordinary proceedings are reported from time to time in China. But seldom anything more remarkable than this incident. Mr. Sen, of Soochow, was dangerously sick of a disease pronounced incurable, and had a son who loved Miss Ma. Miss Ma was "sickly and jaundiced-looking," so that old Mr. Sen disapproved the match. One day he consulted some conjurers about his health and they gravely told him his life would surely end in a few days if his son was not married at once. The stern parent then relented and Miss Ma was soon made Mrs. Sen. But the jaundiced looking bride a few days after her wedding suddenly died. Old Mrs. Ma was very angry at this. Accompanied by a dozen viragoes she entered the house of the Sens and raised a great commotion. The members of the Sen family were roundly beaten with whips and sticks, and the furniture was smashed into a hundred pieces. Everybody took flight before them except the widower, who bravely stood his ground and was beaten without mercy by the infuriated dames. At last they threw him to the floor and tied him by his queue to the feet of his dead wife and there extricated from him a pledge that he would give a protracted wake and mass lasting for 49 days. The coffin was to be an expensive one and of feasting there was to be a plenty. A temporary feast was at once prepared for the mother-in-law and her dozen viragoes, and the eating had been well begun when the mother of young Sen and all those who had followed her in flight from the house entered by a rear door and descended in fury upon the banquet scene. They soon learned that old Mr. Sen had died during their absence, and this intelligence only added to their rage. Mrs. Ma was beaten roundly till she cried aloud for help, and when she became exhausted her head was ceremoniously tied to the corpse of old Mr. Sen. There she was forced to sign a paper that nothing improper had been done, and on the following day there were two funerals in Soochow and no questions asked.

The Cat's Extraordinary Vitality.

A remarkable story is told by the Captain of the bark Kate Howe, which arrived yesterday morning from Liverpool. The Kate Howe was laden in Charleston during last November with cotton for Liverpool. Just before sailing, a cat which belonged on board was missed, and the vessel started on its voyage, and forty-seven days after the hatches were taken off at Liverpool, when the cat crawled slowly forth, presenting a most woe-begone and emaciated appearance. Pussy had been nudged in between two bales of cotton during the voyage, and had been unable to move or to obtain food or water during the whole time. The animal's head was flattened, and one of its legs was twisted over its back, and, although after a few days of careful nursing it recovered its wonted appetite, its former beauty, it is feared, has departed forever.—Baltimore American.

Wives Wanted.

Two desolate men who dwell by the prairies lately sent to the New York Bureau of Emigration a strange request. They ask the superintendent to ship them at their risk and "collect on delivery" two comely, healthy, and strong women suitable for wives. The application was novel, and a paragraph describing it with the title "A Demand for Wives" found its way into the newspapers. The ludicrous result is that the superintendent has been overwhelmed with letters from women in all parts of the east offering themselves as candidates.—New York Evening Post.

TENNESSEE'S State debt is $23,000,000.

A Hurricane at the Mauritius.

The first warnings are an excessive heat, and an atmosphere so oppressive as to lead one almost to believe some unknown agency is at work against human existence; fever strikes with deadly virulence; the rays of the sun are scorching, and the air is so overcharged with electricity as to make men and animals alike feel uncomfortable. Then come a few ragged clouds driven wildly across the coppery sky, the barometer falls rapidly, and an awful stillness pervades everything. The birds flutter uneasily and seek shelter in the thickest woods, the mules start and sniff the air, the Indians tie up their heads and hurry away to their huts. Not a leaf is stirring, all nature seems in a state of horrid expectancy. Then comes a sudden gust, which whistles past, bending the aloes and palm trees nearly double, and leaving them trembling in the still calm which follows. More driving clouds, gray and leaden, creep up from the leaden sea, and sweep swiftly past, their ragged edges blown into wisps which catch and tangle with each other till the sky is covered with them. The roar of the gusts is more frequent, the sky seems to have descended like a roof upon the land. Long since the harbor master has been busy with the shipping. Top-gallant-masts must be struck by all ships in port during the hurricane months; now yards and topmasts are sent down with a run, cables are put out, and each tier of vessels securely lashed together. Ships at the roadstead slip their cables and put to sea to fight it out as best they can; some, profiting by the rules laid down in order to avoid cyclones, escape—some are never heard of again. Another gust, increasing in force, and the second gun is fired from the fort as a signal for the trains to cease running, and for all prudent people to get home. Shutters are closed, windows and doors barricaded, and the town resembles a city of the dead. A few policemen and an odd straggler are all the living things to be seen. Gust now succeeds gust, the roaring of the wind is louder than thunder, and it is difficult to make the voice heard inside a house. Rain falls in sheets, the roads are flooded, the rivers are mere cataracts of milk colored water, the canes toss wildly like live creatures in great agony, forest trees bend double and their branches crack and fly bodily away, the air is filled with driving boughs, leaves, tiles, roofs, wisps of hay, and other debris; houses are torn from their foundations and carried far away; balks of timber and blocks of stone weighing many hundred weight are rolled over. Between the gusts is a dead calm, in which the hiss of the rain and the roar of the departing gust sound painfully distinct. Dry earth has disappeared under a sheet of water dashed and driven into spray, and again beaten flat by the ever descending rain. The surface of the sea is torn up into curious spiral columns revolving with great velocity. Every now and then the sun will shine out for a few seconds with a ghastly glare, then the clouds drop down again, and darkness comes to hide up the cruel wreck. The people in the houses gather round the lamp in the driest room, and listen fearfully as each fresh blast threatens to bring the whole structure about their ears. Sleep is almost impossible, cooking there is none, clothes are saturated with the moisture which drives in through every crevice, and spirits are at their lowest with the thought of the havoc going on outside.—Fraser's Magazine.

The Prince Who Wants a Pulpit.

Of all the members of our royal family perhaps the one with the strongest intellectual bias is Prince Leopold. Unable to mingle much in society, in consequence of a malady which has troubled him again and again all through his career, he has naturally been thrown back upon studious pursuits. He is a very fair scholar, and is certainly possessed by a great enthusiasm for learning and the arts. A few days ago he attended a great meeting in the city of London, called by the Lord Mayor, and spoke on behalf of the extension of university education. He was placed at a great disadvantage by having to follow the greatest orator of his time, Mr. Gladstone, and yet, notwithstanding this, he acquitted himself with marked ability. Mr. Gladstone congratulated the Prince upon his speech, and was evidently astonished both by his fluency and the cogency of his arguments. Prince Leopold has long desired to adopt the church as a profession, and the matter has been discussed at court very recently—so it is confidently affirmed. He certainly has a strong leaning to clericalism, but what we should do with a prince of the blood in the church I do not know. He would prove such a "sensation" that there would be no place large enough to hold audiences, unless Mr. Spurgeon agreed to give up the Metropolitan tabernacle for his use. I am inclined to think that the Church of England would find a great influx of candidates for confirmation if it became known that the queen's son was willing to lay his hands upon them.—London Letter to New York Post.

What is the Zodiacal Light?

This glowing archway across the skies, seen so frequently at this time of the year shortly after sunset, writes a correspondent of the Providence Journal, is one of the astronomical puzzles that men of science are zealously trying to pull to pieces. Thus fair their efforts have been unsuccessful, and the unpracticed observer who looks with simple wonder and admiration upon the elliptical glow in the evening sky knows almost as much of its constitution and mission in the divine economy as the wisest astronomer in the land. Various are the theories that have been advanced to account for the presence of this intruder on terrestrial domain. Some observers consider it a ring of matter revolving round the earth; others look upon it as a collection of minute particles of meteoric or cometic matter traveling round the sun in very eccentric orbits. More recent and more searching examination gives a far grander explanation of its origin, making the zodiacal light a continuation of the corona, and thus indicating a lenticular-shaped atmosphere of inconceivable rarity surrounding the sun and extending out near the plane of the ecliptic beyond the orbit of the earth. Our most thoughtful scientists do not accept this view, but suggest another even more sublime and awe-inspiring. It is that the whole space between the earth and sun is filled with immense clouds of meteoroids, and that the sunlight reflected on these cosmical atoms of floating star-dust is the cause of the soft celestial glow that now lingers evening after evening in our western sky.

A Western Character.

There is some interesting gossip in the Denver Tribune about a gentleman whom old-time Tribune readers have not forgotten—N. C. Meeker, the father of the Greeley colony. He edits the Greeley Tribune from his headquarters in the White river country, where he pursues, on his own account, an Indian policy that puts to the blush noisier pretenders. The Utes look upon him as a species of good father, and his daughter teaches the little Indians. When he was commissioner to the Centennial from Colorado, he and several more of his frontier friends took up their quarters at the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia. The richness and variety of the fare seemed to disgust them all. Said Meeker: "I can't get any thing to eat here; all I want is a piece of roast beef, some potatoes, pie and coffee." And the quartet of agriculturists, who could spin the finest problems in the esthetics of political economy or agriculture, adjourned to a boarding house, where they could get a "piece of roast beef, some potatoes, pie and coffee," for $8 a week. As the government allowed $35 a week, he credited Uncle Sam with $27. "What's that for?" asked a friend. "Oh, wal, I guess the government needs the money more than I do." This was said when the president of the colony was not financially buoyant.

A Clever Rogue.

A gentleman of great experience in the commercial world cashed a check at a London bank for £1,100 taking the whole in £100 notes. He was only a few yards from the bank when a person resembling a clerk, bareheaded and with a pen behind his ear, touched him on the shoulder, saying: "Beg your pardon, sir; will you allow me just to take the number of these notes again? I won't keep you a minute." The gentleman, taking off his guard, handed the notes over to the supposed clerk, whom he followed into the bank. After giving the former time to reach the top end and return, he met the gentleman at the door, saying. "Please walk this way; that gentleman will attend to you in a minute," pointing to a clerk who was deeply engaged. Five minutes elapsed before the gentleman could draw the clerk's attention to his case; and he was thunderstruck to find that this officer knew nothing about it. The other clerks were interrogated, and they were equally in the dark. Of course no time was lost in going to the Bank of England, but too late; the clever rogue had been before them, and obtained gold for the notes.—Chambers' Journal.

Court Scene in Leadville.

Justice is grotesquely travestied in the new Colorado mining town, Leadville. A colored lad was charged with theft. The proceedings were opened by the judge, who turned to the prisoner with the remark: "Well, boss, what have you to say to that?" "You mean if I took dat money?" "Look here young fellow, what have you to say agin this charge?" "Does de court know what de charge is?" "You bet your life," responded the classic judge. "You're charged with fastenin' your hooks onto lucre that wasn't yours." "Well, judge, I'll tell you how it all happened. Dat girl did give me a little loose change, and in looking through de town I dropped it into de bank, and of course bought a 'stack.' De cards didn't just come my way, and I lost." "What about the girl's money? That's what's bothering the court." "Well, I blowed it in!" "Ten days in the county jail. Officer, let the prisoner go and see his friends before his inundation."

A Hungarian Patriot.

The ashes of Count Ladislaus Ujhazy were removed from their tomb in San Antonio, Texas, and sent on their way to Budamer, in the district of Saros, Hungary. Ujhazy was born in 1795 and until 1840 struggled for Hungarian independence. His championship of Republican ideas in the heart of a continent of kings is told in the old story of all such exiles. When he fled to this country in 1849 he was very warmly welcomed and with a few followers founded New Buda, in souther Iowa. The death of his very dear wife there led him to break up his farming and remove to San Antonio. At the breaking out of the civil war he tendered his services to the government and was sent by Minister Seward as consul at Ancona, Italy. At the close of the war he resigned his consulate and returned to his children.

Women in Cyprus.

At 9 or 10 the girls are lovely, having eyes like antelopes, and softly rounded cheeks, hinting at Hebe by-and-bye. But in their after years, when comliness is needed most, much of this beauty fades. Fine eyes remain; but contour, color, bloom, expression, all depart. The Moslem females seem to understand their fate. If their sisters of the Orthodox rite were knowing, they too would glide about the courts and market places veiled. A Christian women bears her neck and face; a Moslem women shows no more than a pair of sparkling eyes. No man looks twice at the retreating figure of a Greek, though she is habited in pink and amber. Every one turns and gazes at the gliding mystery of a girl in white whose face is shrouded from his view.—British Cyprus—Hepworth Dixon.

A College Prank.

Of Professor Thomas Thatcher, of Yale, it is related that in the days of his tutorship his students played a curious prank with him. He had ordered a ton of coal for his room, and it arrived at night-time and was deposited at his door, it being then too late to be got in. During the night some students who were favorably inclined toward the tutor determined to put it in for him. This they did, piece by piece, and through the window. Tutor Thatcher was obliged to get under his bed to escape being stoned, or rather coaled to death. In after years at a public supper, when asked the amount of his salary, Professor Thatcher said "$1,000, with coal put in."—N. Y. Tribune.

THE TRAILING ARBUTUS.

Arbutus, thou dost swing
The subtle censer of the spring;
I sip thy wine, I kiss thy lips,
I softly touch thy pinky tips;
More than I say art thou to me,
A past and still a joy to be!
If e'er I stand of all bereft,
As they do stand whom Death has left,
A treasure dearer far than gold
Mine empty hands will seek and hold,
The first arbutus of the spring;
A simple thing, a little thing,
Yet incense-bearer to the King,
His tidings glad borne on each wing!
All my lost life 'twill backward bring,
And all the life before 'twill touch,
With Spring's young glory. 'Twill be much,
How much! Yet such a little thing—
The first arbutus of the spring!

A SERGEANT of Zouaves had, at the battle of Orleans, his thigh smashed by a fragment of shell. "Well, my poor fellow," said the captain, who visited him in hospital, "you must find it pretty lonesome work, being laid up here." "Oh, no, Cap., not at all," was the reply. "I suffer a good deal and that makes the time slip by."—Paris Paper.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN once listened patiently while a friend read a long manuscript to him and then asked: "What do you think of it? How will it take?" The president reflected a little while, and then answered: "Well, for people who like that kind of thing, I think that is just about the kind of thing they'd like."

WHEN the Confederate army was on its shortest rations General Lee remonstrated one day with a straggler for eating green persimmons, and asked him if he did not know that they were unfit for food. "I'm not eating them for food, General," replied the man, "but for the sake of drawing my stomach up to fit my rations."

Two pitmen met in the street at Cramlington, the other day, and the conversation taking a scientific turn, one of them informed the other that the earth they stood upon turned right round every 24 hours. LISH APPLEGATE'S experience in breaking a steer, in the early days of Oregon: Lish was yoked up with the steer, and the steer ran off. With his legs flying behind him like drumsticks, Lish kept up with the steer as the pair of them broke down the lane at a tearing rate. Meeting a friend, Lish sang out to him: "Stop us! stop us! we are running away!" They were stopped, and the boys began to unyoke Lish, when he turned around, panting, and imploringly said: "Unyoke the other ox first; I'll stand."—Astorian.

AT the Friday evening talk last week, Beecher was discussing the duty of prayer, and urged that all should make reasonable requests if they expected an answer. A brother asked as to praying for peace when in sore trouble. Mr. Beecher said he knew how that was; he had been there. It was useless to pray for rest when one did not take proper measures to secure it. When he had been broken in upon and bothered and hunted until he could not sleep, it was no use to ask God for a sedative; it was necessary first to get some bromide of potash.

THEIR strapped books and the intense earnestness of their conversation plainly told they were Boston school girls. As they tipped gayly along, talking now of this, then of that, and again of just nothing at all, said one, "Oh, May! Mr. Ficklebrains was at our house last evening. Don't you think he is awfully nice. I do love to hear him talk. Why, he is just splendid." "Mr. Ficklebrains!" asked her companion; "who's he?" "Why, don't you know?" came the response. "He's a great inventor. He has made more than forty inventions—and no two of them just alike, either!"—Boston Transcript.

Mr. Webster's attorney (rising and addressing the attorney for the other side)—I call you a coward and a liar!

The Court—Sit down, sir.

Mr. Webster's attorney—He is a coward and a liar.

The Court—I call you to sit down and be quiet.

Mr. Webster's attorney—He is a coward and a liar.

The Court—If you don't sit down and keep quiet you will be sorry.

Mr. Webster's attorney—He is—

In the subsequent proceedings the Court took a hand. It swiftly glided from its seat and placed its powerful grasp upon the coat-collar of the attorney for Mr. Webster. There was a momentary void in the understanding of that gentleman. The morning stars began to sing together in his ears and danced before his confused vision. Then he found himself outside the building without any hat and the dusty zephyrs playing through his luxuriant mustache. Parties present in the room as innocent spectators aver that the feet of the attorney for Mr. Webster did not touch the floor after the muscles of the hand of the Court had contracted upon his collar.

Why Will You

Allow a cold to advance in your system and thus encourage more serious maladies, such as Pneumonia, Hemorrhages and Lung troubles when an immediate relief can be so readily attained. Boschee's German Syrup has gained the largest sale in the world for the cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung Diseases. It is Dr. Boschee's famous German prescription, and is prepared with the greatest care, and no fear need be entertained in administering it to the youngest child, as per directions. The sale of this medicine is unprecedented. Since first introduced there has been a constant increasing demand and without a single report of a failure to do its work in any case. Ask your Druggist as to the truth of these remarks. Large size 75 cents. Try it and be convinced. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

THE GENUINE,

DR. C. McLANE'S

Celebrated American

WORM SPECIFIC

OR

SYMPTOMS OF WORMS.

THE countenance is pale and leaden-colored, with occasional flushes, or a circumscribed spot on one or both cheeks; the eyes become dull; the pupils dilate; an azure semicircle runs along the lower eye-lid; the nose is irritated, swells, and sometimes bleeds; a swelling of the upper lip; occasional headache, with humming or throbbing of the ears; an unusual secretion of saliva; slimy or furred tongue; breath very foul, particularly in the morning; appetite variable, sometimes voracious, with a gnawing sensation of the stomach, at others, entirely gone; fleeting pains in the stomach; occasional nausea and vomiting; violent pains throughout the abdomen; bowels irregular, at times costive; stools slimy, not unfrequently tinged with blood; belly swollen and hard; urine turbid; respiration occasionally difficult, and accompanied by hiccough; cough sometimes dry and convulsive; uneasy and disturbed sleep, with grinding of the teeth; temper variable, but generally irritable, &c.

Whenever the above symptoms are found to exist,
DR. C. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE
will certainly effect a cure.

IT DOES NOT CONTAIN MERCURY in any form; it is an innocent preparation, not capable of doing the slightest injury to the most tender infant.

The genuine DR. McLANE'S VERMIFUGE bears the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on th. wrapper.

—:o:—

DR. C. McLANE'S

LIVER PILLS

are not recommended as a remedy "for all the ills that flesh is heir to," but in affections of the liver, and in all Bilious Complaints, Dyspepsia and Sick Headache, or diseases of that character, they stand without a rival.

AGUE AND FEVER.

No better cathartic can be used preparatory to, or after taking Quinine.

As a simple purgative they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Each box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

Each wrapper bears the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS.

Insist upon having the genuine Dr. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

TUTT'S PILLS!

A NOTED DIVINE SAYS THEY ARE WORTH THEIR WEIGHT in GOLD

READ WHAT HE SAYS!

DR. TUTT:—Dear Sir: For ten years I have been a martyr to Dyspepsia, Constipation and Piles. Last Spring your Pills were recommended to me; I used them (but with little faith). I am now a well man, have good appetite, digestion perfect, regular stools, piles gone, and I have gained forty pounds solid flesh. They are worth their weight in gold.

REV. R. L. SIMPSON, Louisville, Ky.

A TORPID LIVER

is the fruitful source of many diseases, such as Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Costiveness, Dysentery, Bilious Fever, Ague and Fever, Jaundice, Piles, Rheumatism, Kidney Complaint, Colic, etc.

Tutt's Pills exert a powerful influence on the Liver, and will with certainty relieve that important organ from disease, and restore its normal functions.

The rapidity with which persons take on flesh, while under the influence of these pills, of itself indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system.

CONSTIPATION.

Only with regularity of the bowels can perfect health be enjoyed. When the constipation is of recent date, a single dose of TUTT'S PILLS will suffice, but if it has become habitual, one pill should be taken every night, gradually lessening the frequency of the dose until a regular daily movement is obtained, which will soon follow.

TUTT'S PILLS!

A NOTED DIVINE SAYS THEY ARE WORTH THEIR WEIGHT in GOLD READ WHAT HE SAYS:

DR. TUTT:—Dear Sir: For ten years I have been a martyr to Dyspepsia, Constipation and Piles. Last Spring your Pills were recommended to me; I used them (but with little faith). I am now a well man, have good appetite, digestion perfect, regular stools, piles gone, and I have gained forty pounds solid flesh. They are worth their weight in gold.
REV. R. L. SIMPSON, Louisville, Ky.

A TORPID LIVER

is the fruitful source of many diseases, such as Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Costiveness, Dysentery, Bilious Fever, Ague and Fever, Jaundice, Piles, Rheumatism, Kidney Complaint, Colic, etc.

Tutt's Pills exert a powerful influence on the Liver, and will with certainty relieve that important organ from disease, and restore its normal functions.

The rapidity with which persons take on flesh, while under the influence of these pills, of itself indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system.

CONSTIPATION.

Only with regularity of the bowels can perfect health be enjoyed. When the constipation is of recent date, a single dose of TUTT'S PILLS will suffice, but if it has become habitual, one pill should be taken every night, gradually lessening the frequency of the dose until a regular daily movement is obtained, which will soon follow.

Sold Everywhere, 25 Cents.

THE GENUINE

DR. C. McLANE'S

CELEBRATED

FOR THE CURE OF

Hepatitis, or Liver Complaint,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increases on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to, or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them a FAIR TRIAL.

For all bilious derangements, and as a simple purgative, they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Every box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

The genuine McLANE'S LIVER PILLS bear the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrappers.

Insist upon having the genuine DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

The Statistics About Widowers and Divorced Persons Who Twice Worship Hymen.

[New York World.]

A French doctor, Bertillon by name, a person with a taste for figures, mitigated by an appreciation of the popular preference for what concerns the personal life and experience of mankind in the concrete, has made some curious studies in the statistics of matrimony with a view to extracting therefrom such practical suggestions as they may contain.

The first question which he undertakes to throw light upon is whether it is healthy and conducive to long life to marry. Those who are married already and propose to "remain as they are" will be gratified to learn that he reaches an affirmative conclusion, while those who are wedded only to themselves will be likely to cast cynical slurs on the correctness of his calculations. He finds that those who share their joys and sorrows, and perhaps multiply them at the same time, will stand "the thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to" much better than those who attempt to bear the burden of life alone. There is a single exception which should convey a wholesome warning. There is an altogether abnormal rate of mortality among those foolish people who marry under the age of twenty. But, taking a thousand married men from twenty-five to thirty years of age, he finds that only six die yearly, while of a like number of bachelors ten drop off. Perhaps some of the latter perish on account of persistent and unavailing efforts to get married and the misery which their failure entails. Perhaps they blaze out their lives to a greater extent than husbands in dissipation and are every way more careless of themselves. But whatever the cause, the veracious figures attest the important fact. The disparity continues, however, during the subsequent days of manhood, slightly diminishing with the decline into the vale of years. Thus between the ages of forty-five and fifty, of 1,000 Benedicts, eleven die yearly, and of an equal number of the single men who survive their wretchedness that long twenty give up the struggle every twelve month. The same thing is true of women as of men, though to a slightly smaller extent, owing possibly to more regular habits and better care of their health. But those who have been married and lose their partners in life fare worst of all. Of widowers between twenty-five and thirty years of age twenty-two in 1,000 die annually. Whether this alarming mortality is due to grief does not appear from the doctor's statistics, but another part of his calculation shows that if such is the case a large portion of the victims of the malady seek for a speedy cure.

These inquiries that furnish the basis of these latter calculations were directed to ascertaining what proportion of the bereaved marry again and what relation the number bears to that of celibates of the same age who assume the blissful bonds. The above-mentioned considerations of health and long life appear to have nothing to do with the result. At all events, the learned doctor makes an entirely different application of his figures. His purpose is to indicate the effect of experience on the inclination of those who have once ventured, with happy results or otherwise. What he expected to prove is not altogether clear. He finds, after assiduous ciphering from carfully concealed data, that of 1,000 bachelors between the ages of twenty-five and thirty-five years about 110 enter the state of matrimony in the course of a year. Of 1,000 widowers of the same age 356 is the yearly number that take the yoke. Now this may indicate that the happiness and the advantages exceed in actual experience the anticipation and belief of those who have not made the trial, or it may not. Doubtless it shows that at least wedded life loses some of its terrors for one who has had experience of it. Possibly the widower who made a mistake for the first time in the blindness of youthful ardor is conscious of an ability, acquired by sober observation, to do better a second time. He may or may not have found matrimony all that his ardent hopes had pictured it, but he very likely reaches a sober and unromantic state of mind, in which he feels that he can make a choice on good common sense principles. Then there is the fact that in many cases he has children that need the care of a mother which may exert a powerful influence over his action. And here again it is shown that the same rule applies to woman as to men, but not to the same extent. Another class to which Dr. Bertillion extended his inquiries is that of divorced persons. One would suppose that in such cases marriage having manifestly once proved a failure there would be more reluctance to try it again, but the figures show that from the age of twenty-six to forty, divorced persons marry, "in smaller proportion than widowers, indeed, but more readily than bachelors, while after forty they even excel widowers in their readiness to re-enter the connubial state.

Popular Errors.

To think that the more a man eats the fatter and stronger he will become. To believe that the more hours children study, the faster they will learn. To conclude that if exercise is good, the more violent it is the more good is done. To imagine that every hour taken from sleep is an hour gained. To act on the presumption that the smallest room in the house is large enough to sleep in. To argue that whatever remedy causes one to feel immediately better is good for the system, without rerard to more ulterior effects. To eat without an appetite, or to continue to eat after it has been satisfied, merely to gratify the taste. To eat a hearty supper for the pleasure experienced during the brief time that it is passing down the throat, at the expense of a whole night of disturbed sleep and a night of weary waking in the morning.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. Sherar, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 6-eow 6-m.

Pears.

As the peach crop has become so unreliable of late years, and as we desire a fruit better than [illegible] peach, more attention should be given to pear growing. There is an old saying that "he who plants pears plants for heirs," which is not at all applicable to these times, for pears will bear as soon as apples, and, if fear of blight is urged, we would say that he who wants anything now that has not its especial enemy is likely to want. We know of but few orchards that have not well paid for themselves before the blight caught them, and many which have never been troubled with it at all. Whatever blight is, there appears to be one thing demonstrated fully, and that is, it is worse on highly enriched ground than on that of medium fertility. The idea has always been that pears require a very rich soil and high culture, and then because they made an excessive wood growth the trees were weakened by heavy pruning, and consequently most pears were petted to death. If they were planted on land that would bring forty bushels of corn, and enough cultivation given to induce fair growth, and pruned only when actually necessary, we are confident there would be far less blight, and pear-growing become more popular. That at least is our experience.—Exchange.

The Farmer's Creed.

We believe in small farms and thorough cultivation.

That the soil loves to eat as well as the owner, and ought, therefore, to be well manured.

In going to the bottom of things, and therefore, deep plowing and enough of it. All the better if it be a subsoil plow.

In large crops, which leave land better than they found it, making both farm and farmer rich at once.

That every farm should own a good farmer.

That the fertilizer of any soil is a spirit of industry, enterprise and intelligence—without these lime, gypsum and guano will be of little use.

In good fences, good farmhouses, good orchards and children enough to gather the fruit.

In a clean kitchen, a neat wife in it, a clean cupboard, a clean dairy and a clear conscience.

That to ask a man's advice is not stooping, but of much benefit.

That to keep a place, and everything in its place, saves many a step, and is pretty sure to lead to good tools and to keep them in order.

That kindness to stock, like good shelter, is a saving of fodder.

That it is a good thing to keep an eye on experiments and note all—good and bad.

That it is a good rule to sell your grain when it is ready.

That it is a good thing to grow into farming, not to jump into it.

That all of farming is summed up in the manure heap on the farm.

In enriching the soil according to its wants.

REPORTER.

A Rooster Child.

(St. Louis Times, April 1.)

The steamer Colorado, which arrived in this city on Tuesday last, had on board a passenger who promises to create a profound sensation here, not only among the medical fraternity, but among the public at large. It is a boy six years of age, and the formation of his head and feet present the most remarkable freak of nature, undoubtedly, that the world has ever seen. His head is shaped exactly like that of a rooster, with bill, comb, wattles and feathers complete. It is as large as the head of an ordinary child of six years, and the feathers extend to the shoulders. The boy wears a jacket closely buttoned at the neck, and presents the appearance of a huge rooster clothed in the garb of humanity. There is absolutely nothing about the head to indicate that it is that of a human being, and it is as perfect a production on a large scale of that of a member of the barnyard tribe as it is possible to imagine. The feet and lower limbs, from the knees down, are also those of a rooster, although they are several sizes larger than ever those of the largest Shanghai fowl. The hands are those of a human being perfectly formed, but abundantly large. Except the head, feet and lower limbs the child has a human development. During the trip up the river it was accompanied by its father and mother, and was kept in their stateroom, except when it was occasionally taken on deck closely veiled for a breath of fresh air.

Why Will You

Allow a cold to advance in your system and thus encourage more serious maladies, such as Pneumonia, Hemorrhages and Lung troubles when an immediate relief can be so readily attained. Boschee's German Syrup has gained the largest sale in the world for the cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung Diseases. It is Dr. Boschee's famous German prescription, and is prepared with the greatest care, and no fear need be entertained in administering it to the youngest child, as per directions. The sale of this medicine is unprecedented. Since first introduced there has been a constant increasing demand and without a single report of a failure to do its work in any case. Ask your Druggist as to the truth of these remarks. Large size 75 cents. Try it and be convinced. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

SEVERAL large buildings on Fourth street, Philadelphia, used for a variety of manufacturing purposes, were burned last week, the pecuniary loss being placed at $750,000. One fireman was killed and three were severely injured by falling walls.

BY the capsizing of a schooner in a gale in Chesapeake bay, near Baltimore, Capt. REV. JOHN MILLER, D. D., late Professor of the Theological Seminary, of Princeton, N. J., has been formally deposed from the Presbyterian ministry for heresy.

THE Vermont murderer, John P. Phair, who had been three times reprieved, was hanged on the 10th inst., at Windsor, Vt. The murder was committed in Rutland, July, 1874....George Hess, of Shohola, Pa., cut his wife's throat, and then drowned himself.... The Massachusetts House of Representatives rejected the bill to secure women the right to vote on municipal affairs in cities and towns, but passed the bill to give women the right to vote for members of school committees.

THE WEST.

A FIRE on Fifth street and Washington avenue, St. Louis, Mo., destroyed upward of $560,000 worth of property. Two men were killed and several injured by falling walls....At Chicago John Lamb has been sentenced to be hung on the 20th of June next, for the murder of Police Officer Race in the fall of 1878.

AT Indianapolis, Warren Tate, for the murder of William Love, who was shot in the corridor of the Court House on the 8th of September, has been tried and acquitted. The theory of the defense was that the shooting was done in self-defense.

THE town of Loon Creek, Idaho, was recently attacked by Indians. They killed five Chinamen and scalped two, and mutilated the bodies. No white men were present, all being at work in the gulch.

CHICAGO elevators contain 7,196,630 bushels of wheat, 2,873,701 bushels of corn, 499,363 bushels of oats, 249,172 bushels of rye, and 616,682 bushels of barley, making a total of 11,435,448 bushels, against 3,846,589 bushels at this period last year.

A DISPATCH from Kansas City, Mo., says about 1,200 destitute negroes have arrived there from the South. "What to do with these people has become a serious question. They have landed on Kansas soil, just west of the State line, and inside of the limits of the city of Wyandotte. The people of Wyandotte cannot support them, and the authorities of Kansas do not seem to care for them. They say it is impossible to leave, as they have no money. The leader, or 'deacon,' of the colony declares they were promised an award from the Government of 160 acres of land. A circular had been distributed throughout the Southern States, which distinctly specified that there was landed estate awaiting the colored men in Kansas. In reply to the question as to what they proposed doing, the 'deacon' looked as if he was called upon to crack a conundrum, but said that all they wanted was to get back to their home in the South."

A BILL making an appropriation for the completion of the monument to Stephen A. Douglas, at Chicago, has been defeated in the Illinois Senate.

THE SOUTH.

IT is reported from Charleston, S. C., that the election cases now pending in the United States Circuit Court there are to be dropped, in consideration of the State authorities suspending further proceedings against ex-Gov. Chamberlain, ex-Representative Smalls, ex-State Treasurer Cardozo and other Republicans.

HEAVY frosts, doing much damage to fruit and growing crops, were reported in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina during the first week in April.

GENERAL.

GEN. LEW WALLACE, the new Governor of New Mexico, is not pleased with the situation there. He writes to Secretary Schurz that the state of society in New Mexico is lawless to a deplorable extent. Murders and robberies are so common that he is almost discouraged at the outlook.

PRIVATE information has been received at Washington, directly from Maj. Walsh, commanding the Canadian Mounted Police, near Sitting Bull's camp, who speaks of the old warrior as quiet, and contradicts the Washington statement that Walsh reported him ugly and insubordinate.

THE last weekly health report issued by the Marine Hospital service, in accordance with the National Quarantine act, gives the health of each of twenty-three American cities during the week ending April 7. In the number of cities named there were 2,413 deaths during the past week. The national health was very good during the period in question, the average death-rate being 19.3 persons to every 1,000 inhabitants. A low death-rate was reported in all of the principal cities, with the exception of Newark, N. J. Eleven persons out of every 1,000 died in St. Louis last week, against sixteen out of every 1,000 in Chicago.

THE widow Oliver has entered the lecture field, and will visit the North and West and deliver her lecture entitled "My Late Trial with Senator Cameron."

POLITICAL.

IT is stated in a Washington dispatch that "Senator Logan called on the President with several Illinois capitalists, who proffered the use of all the money the Government may need to keep in motion the wheels of the machine in case he shall veto the appropriation bills with the Democratic conditions attached. It is said these gentlemen came away rather the reverse of well pleased with the indifferent manner in which Mr. Hayes received and treated their suggestions."

MUNICIPAL elections were held throughout Ohio on the 7th inst. At Columbus, Collins, Republican, was elected Mayor by 1,700 majority. In Cleveland and Cincinnati the Republicans also elected the Mayor by about 1,200 majority. In Sandusky, Zanesville, Akron and Painesville the Democratic tickets were successful. At Toledo the Nationals elected the Mayor by 500 majority. Dayton, Republican by a small majority.

RETURNS of the Michigan election indicate that Judge Campbell, the Republican candidate for Justice of the Supreme Court, is elected over the Democratic-Greenback candidate by about 6,000 majority.——At Albany, N. Y., the Democrats elected ten, the Democrats and Nationals twenty-one, and the Republicans four Supervisors. John Guttman, Democrat, was re-elected Justice of the Justice's Court by 3,000 majority.——At Kansas City, Mo., the Greenbackers elected the Mayor.

UNDER the heading, "The Candidates of 1880," the New York Times publishes reports showing the state and tendency of public opinion throughout the Union upon the choice of candidates most likely to be made by the Republican and Democratic parties for the Presidential campaign of 1880. The introduction says: "We have information from every State in the Union, gathered by more than 170 correspondents, stationed at from one to eighteen points in each State. Each correspondent covered a large field, including many important centers of political thought and discussion. The letters come from intelligent men of both political parties. Our correspondents do not give their individual views simply, but the preferences expressed by the people of their sections. The results point unmistakably to the nomination of Gen. Grant by the Republicans, and of Mr. Tilden by the Democrats. The vast preponderance of Republican sentiment in favor of Gen. Grant leaves all other candidates in the rear."....The announcement is made on the authority of Gov. Hendricks that he will not again take a second place on the Presidential ticket in 1880.

THE Republicans of Kentucky have nominated Walter Evans for Governor....Ex-Governor Seymour authorizes and requests the announcement that upon no consideration would he consent to be a candidate for any public office. THE President has appointed J. R. Hallowell United States Attorney for Kansas, and Arthur L. Thomas, of Pennsylvania, Secretary of Utah Territory.

THE United States Supreme Court has rendered its decision in the Chicago whisky cases. The decision is adverse to the whisky men, and reverses the judgment of the Chicago court. The court holds as to immunity that the District Attorney had no power to grant it, and that the most those to whom it was granted could expect was to secure a continuance for the purpose of seeking Executive clemency.

THE United States Supreme Court has informally agreed to adjourn May 12—possibly one week earlier. There have been disposed of at this term, after argument, 350 cases. An unusually large number have been settled by arbitration. There remain 700 cases on the docket. The Justices favor the creation of an intermediate Appellate Court. They do not think the appointment of additional Justices would take the pressure off the court. Indeed, one of the Justices says that five could do the work as well as nine.

SECRETARY SHERMAN last week issued the first call for the redemption of 10-40 5 per cent. Government bonds of 1866, amounting in all to $10,000,000, the principal and interest of which are due on and after June 9, 1879.

FOREIGN.

THE Egyptian officer sent to break up the slave depots at Bahr El Gazel, in Central Africa, reports an engagement with Suleiman, the chief slave-trader. The Egyptian forces numbered 3,000, part armed with improved rifles, and were intrenched. Suleiman, with 11,000 Arabs, made several assaults, but they were completely defeated, and fled in disorder, leaving 1,067 dead. On the day after the battle 5,000 deserters came to the Egyptian camp. The Egyptians followed the retiring enemy and killed ten chiefs and 2,000 more men, and were still in pursuit at the last advices. The capture of all the slave depots is considered certain.

THE annual boat-race between crews from Oxford and Cambridge Universities, which always creates an immense amount of excitement and enthusiasm in England, took place on the 5th inst. over the usual course. As expected, Cambridge won easily, being never headed from start to finish. ....President Grevy has signed another list of pardons of French Communists.... A dispatch from Capetown, South Africa, says that Oham, Cetywayo's brother, with his eldest son and 300 warriors, have surrendered unconditionally on the 2d of March. Oham is supposed to be an aspirant for Cetywayo's throne. There has been no important military movement against the Zulus.

GARIBALDI arrived in Rome the other day, so seriously ill that he had to be carried on a litter from the railway station to his son's residence. It is believed by his admirers that his life is drawing to close, and that he has gone to Rome to die....Edward Clark, a London contractor, has failed for $3,500,000....At the supplementary elections in France for Deputies, the moderate Republicans were generally successful.

IT is announced in dispatches from London that the required capital for the new French Atlantic cable, 42,000,000 francs, has been subscribed and a fourth of the sum actually paid in.

ANOTHER disaster has overtaken the British in South Africa. For some weeks it has been known that Col. Pearson's force at Ekowe was in a very critical position. It appears that Pearson, weary of waiting for relief, made an attempt to cut his way through the savages. The attempt was repulsed, and a large number of the sortising party killed. Particulars of the affair are lacking, but it is feared in London that Pearson's whole command, weakened by this heavy loss, has been overpowered and massacred.——And still another disaster is reported. A convoy of supplies proceeding from Derby to Luneburg escorted by 104 men of the Eightieth regiment, was attacked by 4,000 Zulus. Owing to a previous alarm, the British were under arms, but were overwhelmed by the enormously superior force of the enemy. Capt. Moriarity and forty men were killed, and twenty are missing.... Affairs in Egypt are becoming complicated. The Ministers appointed on behalf of England and France refuse to resign, in accordance with the desire of the Khedive, who has, nevertheless, appointed a new Ministry. There is considerable excitement in England and France at the attitude of the Khedive, and France is preparing to send a naval force to Alexandria.

THE Russian revolutionary committee has sent letters to all the imperial dignitaries at St. Petersburg saying that, though they do not intend to attack the Czar, they will continue to kill his attendants, especially the heads of the Police Department, so long as the treatment of political prisoners is unameliorated....Several serious collisions between striking colliers and the police have occurred in the English mining districts.

AT the recent council in St. Petersburg Gen. Todleben declared he believed that war was the only solution of the Eastern Roumelian difficulty. Count Schouvaloff strongly opposed this view.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

"The debate on the Army Appropriation bill was continued in the House on the 4th. The first to speak was Mr. Singleton (Democrat), of Mississippi, who stated the question to be, whether the House had the courage and determination to repeal pernicious laws, or would falter and fail in its duty to the country. On the face of the disgraceful law which it was now proposed to repeal, the boasted freedom of America was a mockery and a lie. Mr. Weaver (Greenbacker), of Iowa, spoke next. He deprecated the keeping open of sectional animosities, and said the National Greenback party wanted no soldiers at the polls. Nor did they want the presence of any armed men when elections were being held; neither did the Greenback party want the test-oath for jurors; nor did the National Greenback party want any marshals at elections unless the history of elections, after the experiment should have been tried, would prove that the country would not get on without them. But he had not the least doubt of the constitutional power of the Government to protect citizens at the polls. It was only a question of policy and necessity as to the Supervisors; that feature ought to be retained in the law with a modification, and they should be chosen, not from the two parties, but from the parties having Congressional tickets in the field. That would give the Greenback party a chance. Mr. De La Matyr (Greenbacker), of Indiana, expressed his intention to vote for the bill as it stood. He thought the House had better show some desire to relieve the people instead of giving themselves wholly to wrangle over the firing upon Sumter, the returning to slavery of Burns, the fiasco of John Brown, and the general criminations and recriminations. Mr. Jones (Greenbacker), of Texas, opposed the placing of political legislation on an appropriation bill. Mr. Wright (Greenbacker), of Pennsylvania, condemned the reopening of the dead issues of the war, and predicted defeat (in 1880) for the party that raised them. Mr. Hawley (Republican), of Connecticut, followed, denouncing the purpose of the majority, which would leave the Government to be carried on by the voluntary service of its officers or by voluntary subscriptions such as flowed into the treasury in 1860. It was threatened by gentlemen of that majority that if the President should veto the bill they would apply the thumb-screws to the minority in order to obtain a two-thirds majority, and, failing in that, the appropriation should fail. To that programme the minority would invariably vote nay to the end of the chapter. It was not now a question of the merit of the statutes, but of methods, and the Democratic method was dangerous, reprehensible, and to be opposed. Mr. Tucker (Democrat), of Virginia, spoke at length upon the legal questions involved, and then, in allusion to statements from gentlemen on the other side that they would never yield, said he would tell them that, in the conflict between power and liberty, if power would not yield liberty was just as firm. Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, closed the debate for the Republicans. He expressed his willingness to help the Democrats wipe from the statute-book the law authorizing the use of the army at the polls. A bill for that purpose should be introduced in the regular manner. Mr. New offered an amendment providing that nothing in the section shall be construed as abridging or affecting the duty or power of the President under the constitution to send troops on application of the Legislature or Executive of a State. Mr. Baker, of Indiana, offered an amendment to the amendment, making it unlawful for any one to have on his person fire-arms, bowie-knives, clubs or bludgeons in the vicinity of a place where an election is being held.

Consideration of the Army bill was resumed in the House on the 5th. Mr. Sparks (Democrat), of Illinois, spoke in favor of the repeal of the law permitting the use of troops at the polls. The issue, he said, was whether or not in this country, this free country, this great republic, the armed soldiers, the paid servants of the sovereign people, were to come to the polls to drive the sovereign people away. That was the issue. Gentlemen (Mr. Sparks said addressing the Republican side) you make the issue; we go to the country upon it; we mean to stand upon it; we know this sovereign power that stands behind us, stands behind you, and to it the President and Governors and Congress must all yield, and the sovereign people we know are with us. Mr. Chittenden followed, and said: When you repeal these laws you disfranchise not only the weak and ignorant in every part of this country, but in all the large cities you disfranchise men who have not the courage to meet the desperadoes and bulldozers and blacklegs at the polls. The amendment offered by Mr. New, that a repeal shall not abridge or affect the right and duty of the Executive to respond to a call of a State Legislature or Governor was agreed to—85 to 4. The Republicans did not vote. Mr. Lowe moved to strike out section 6. Mr. Conger suggested that if that were done his side would aid in passing immediately, without debate, a separate bill repealing entirely the so-called objectionable section of the statutes. Mr. McMahon said in 1865 the party which was represented by his friend from Michigan had claimed almost unlimited power with the troops. The law not only denied that unlimited power, but put the seal of crime on the officers who violated it, and he wanted to keep that law there, and for that reason, speaking for himself alone, repudiated the proposition. Discussion followed, in which Messrs. Haskell, Cox, Conger and Price participated. Mr. Cannon moved to strike out the word "civil" where it occurs in the sixth section, and spoke in favor of the proposition. Rejected—112 to 137. Mr. Brewer submitted an amendment providing that nothing contained in the bill shall in any way limit the right or power of civil officers of the Government to keep peace at the polls at such times as are prescribed for the election of members of Congress. Rejected—yeas, 117; nays, 139. Mr. Conger moved as a substitute for section 6 the following: "That sections 2,002 and 5,528 of the Revised Statutes be and the same are hereby repealed." Rejected—yeas, 109; nays, 138. Mr. Caswell moved to strike out the portion of the section providing for penalties. Rejected. The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Lowe to strike out the whole of section 6. Rejected—yeas, 122; nays, 135. The committee rose and reported the bill, which was then passed—yeas, 148; nays, 122—a strict party vote. The Greenbackers voted as follows: Affirmative—De La Matyr, Ford, Gillette, Jones, Ladd, Lowe, Murch, Stevenson, Weaver, and Yokum. Negative—Barlow and Forsythe.

The New Hampshire Senatorial case of Charles H. Bell occupied the attention of the Senate on the 7th. Mr. Booth introduced a bill to repeal the Atlantic and Pacific railroad grant. Mr. Ingalls introduced a bill for the relief of the central branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. A resolution was adopted authorizing the President of the Senate to appoint a select committee of five to take into consideration all matters relating to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.——The House was not in session.

The Army Appropriation bill was reported to the Senate, without amendment, on the 8th. Mr. Blaine gave notice of an amendment making it a penal offense, punishable with fine and imprisonment, for any military, naval or civil officer, or any other person, except for the purpose named in the bill, to appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description within a mile of any polling-place where a general or special election for representatives in Congress is being held. Mr. Bayard's resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of the sums paid to John I. Davenport, Supervisor of Elections at New York since 1870, was adopted. Consideration of the New Hampshire Senatorial case was then resumed. Messrs. Garland, Wallace, Kernan and Carpenter opposed and Mr. Groome favored the admission of Mr. Bell.——The House, after an hour of wrangling over precedents in a debate in committee of the whole, immediately proceeded with the Legislative Appropriation bill, and commenced the formal reading of it.

The Senate did nothing beyond discussing the New Hampshire Senatorial case on the 9th. Mr. Davis opposed the admission of Bell, and Messrs. McDonald and Jones (Fla.) spoke in favor of his admission.——The House devoted the entire day to the discussion of the machinery of parliamentary procedure, and some important changes were made in the rules. It was decided to appoint special committees on Census, on Civil Service, on Means of Ascertaining the Presidential Vote, on Origin and Introduction of Epidemic Diseases, on Ventilation of the House, on the Labor Question, and to increase membership of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to seven, on Coinage to eleven, on Ways and Means to thirteen, and on Agriculture, Judiciary, Elections, Commerce and Appropriations to fifteen each. Among the most important changes was a new rule which authorizes the Committee on Commerce to report the River and Harbor bill at any time. The most important change of all was a new rule, adopted by a vote of 130 yeas to [illegible] nays, which permits the committees on Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, and Coinage to report bills at any time, and on motion of any member the House may, by a majority vote, fix a day for the consideration of any public bill which may be reported by any of these committees. A new rule, which will be of great benefit for purposes of general legislation, was adopted, which provides that the morning hour shall not be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote of the members present. This will prevent a single committee from monopolizing the time of the House, as is now frequently done.——At a Democratic caucus of the House members, after the adjournment for the day, a resolution was passed, with but one dissenting vote, that the House will regularly proceed to business on Monday, the 14th.

The Senate finally settled the New Hampshire Senatorial case on the 10th by the admission of Charles H. Bell. The vote was 35 yeas to 28 nays. Two Republicans—Carpenter and Conkling—voted with the minority. Senator Davis, of Illinois, voted against Bell. Ten Democrats voted with the majority, namely, Bayard, Gordon, Groome, Jones, McDonald, Randolph, Voorhees, Walker, White and Williams.——The House was at work on the Legislative Appropriation bill.

THE ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

RESUME OF THE EVIDENCE TAKEN BY SENATOR WALLACE'S COMMITTEE.

John G. Thompson was called by the Republican members of the committee, and detailed his connection with the Democratic Congressional Committee in 1878. No money was collected from employes of the House of Representatives. Witness devoted most of his time during the summer of 1878 to conducting the campaign, but came to Washington on the 1st of every month to see to the disbursement of members' salaries. Did not neglect his official duties. Duncan S. Walker, Secretary of the Democratic Congressional Committee in 1878, testified that the headquarters of the committee for a portion of the campaign were in the room of the House Committee on Agriculture. The amount collected by the committee was $4,695. The number of documents sent out was [illegible]. The documents were nearly all folded in the room of the House Committee on Post-Roads and Printing. Large numbers of documents were sent out by the committee under the frank of members of Congress, but nothing not a privilege. Postage was paid on all the documents not frankable. Witness read a statement showing that the expenses of the folding-room for 1878 were only $20,598, as against larger sums ranging up to as high as $109,000 the last ten years. Harry Cobaut, Captain of the Watch in the Treasury Department, testified that he had charge of furnishing Pennsylvania voters in that department with free transportation to their homes, and tax receipts where they had failed to pay their taxes, both of which were furnished by Russell, acting for the State Central Republican Committee. George C. Gorham was recalled, and furnished the statements heretofore called for, from which it appears that 732 circulars were sent to employes in the departments, 435 of which were not responded to, twenty-five were returned, and 272 resulted in subscriptions amounting to $3,247. He had found cases where the circulars were sent to persons receiving salaries of less than $1,000, and he wished to correct his previous statement on that point.

SENATOR JOHNSTON, of Virginia, is 5 feet 10 inches in height, and weighs 194 pounds.

HERBERT SPENCER has recovered, and will soon bring out a new philosophical work.

SENATOR JONES, of Nevada, is 5 feet 8 inches in height, and weighs 190 pounds.

SENATOR KELLOGG, of Louisiana, is 5 feet 9½ inches in height, and weighs 153 pounds.

SENATOR GARLAND, of Arkansas, is 6 feet 2 inches high, and weighs 209 pounds.

THE authorities of Bucyrus, Ohio, have discovered an honest tramp. He found $1,300, and reported it.

MR. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL has obtained leave of absence, and will make a trip home from Spain the coming summer.

BISMARCK gave a dinner to the members of the Diet not long ago, and provided them with beer from the royal brewery. The members of the Diet liked the diet.

JUSTICE HUNT, of the United States Supreme Court, is slowly convalescing, but with no prospect of ever being able to resume his official duties. His disease is paralysis. He is 68 years old.

EX-SENATOR CHRISTIANCY has taken with him to Peru his son, a boy of 15, who will be his private secretary. Mrs. Christiancy will follow him on the 10th of June. Minister Christiancy receives $10,000 a year, with $400 for office rent.

MARTIN EWING, an old darkey of Dalton, Miss., claims to be 114 years old. Col. James Ewing, who brought him from Virginia, and who died in 1859, aged 84, said that when he was a little child Martin was large enough to plow.

WHEN the Russian female doctors who heroically served as army surgeons in Turkey during the last Turko-Russian war returned to their country, they found that the opposition to their admission to regular medical practice had disappeared. They are now officially employed, on an equal footing with other members of the faculty, in many hospitals and in different provincial districts.

MISS EUGENIA PARHAM, of Ballard, Ky., is a petite young lady, with the finest golden hair and the pearliest teeth in the world. She has such winsome ways and is withal so charming that it does one's heart good to think about her. And what, do you suppose, is Miss Eugenia's occupation, crocheting? making plum-puddings? selling sugar in a grocery? No, indeed, for she is the editor of the Ballard News, which has a larger circulation than any other paper in the world, never tells a story, is profound, vivacious, newsy, and comes out every week.

ELI PERKINS does not always jam the house when lecturing. At Hopkinsville, Ky., recently, he had an audience of eighteen. Maj. Gaines was called upon to introduce him. Instead of following the ordinary form of public introduction, the Major picked the audience out one by one. "Col. Morris, allow me to introduce you to my friend, Mr. Perkins." Col. Morris arose from the front bench and said, "Good-evening, Mr. Perkins." Mr. Perkins bowed and said: "Good-evening, Col. Morris." "Col. McPherson, allow me to introduce to you my friend, Mr. Perkins." "Good-evening, Mr. Perkins," said Col. McPherson. "Good-evening, Col. McPherson," replied Mr. Perkins, bowing low from his exalted position. "Col. Jones," said the Major, "allow me——" and so on until the eighteen Colonels had been presented.

A WONDERFUL RUNNER.

From Paris to Moscow in Thirteen Days and Eighteen Hours.

[From the New York Times.]

The present interest in pedestrianism, manifested by the gathering of throngs of people to witness walking and running matches, was equally great in the early part of the century, but was then centered in the wonderful and almost incredible performances of one man. This was Mensen Ernst, born in Bergen, Norway, on Oct. 19, 1799. He was the son of a sea Captain, and when still a boy entered the English navy. Although his powers as a runner were displayed even in his boyhood, he had made three voyages to the East Indies, and had completed a three-years' cruise on the frigate Caledonian before he made a public exhibition of them, which he first did by running a race in London when 19 years old. Though up to this time he had had no training, and had even lacked a pedestrian's ordinary opportunities for muscular development, he was famed throughout the navy as a runner, and wonderful stories as to his extraordinary powers circulated among all branches of the service. At last a heavy sum of money was wagered by the officers of his ship that Mensen would run from London to Portsmouth, a distance of seventy-three miles, in less than ten hours. The feat was attempted and accomplished, the distance being covered by the sailor in exactly nine hours. Shortly afterward he ran from London to Liverpool, a distance of 150 miles, in thirty-two hours. Although thus successful as a runner, Mensen did not quit the sea until after having distinguished himself by bravery in the battle of Navarino, fought Oct. 20, 1827. Soon after that date he became a professional runner, and, after winning a number of lesser matches, was induced to undertake the great feat of running from Paris to Moscow. He started from the Place Vendome at 4 o'clock in the afternoon of June 11, 1831, and entered the Kremlin at 10 o'clock a. m. of June 25, having accomplished the distance of 1,760 miles in thirteen days and eighteen hours.

This feat created a decided sensation throughout Europe, and the employment of Mensen as a courier extraordinary by Kings and Princes became a popular amusement in European courts. He ran from country to country and from court to court, bearing messages of congratulation, condolence, or dispatches of greater importance, and, whenever matched against the regular mounted couriers easily succeeded in beating them. He always carried with him a map, a compass, and as many biscuits and ounces of raspberry sirup as there were to be days occupied on the journey. In winter he took with him a pair of long, slender Norwegian snow-shoes, and, in traveling, he always chose the most direct line, turning out neither for mountains nor rivers, but climbing the one and swimming the other. He never walked, but invariably ran, keeping up a long, swinging lope for hours at a time without rest. His only refreshment was one biscuit and an ounce of raspberry sirup per day, and two short rests of ten or fifteen minutes each in twenty-four hours. These rests he took while standing or leaning against a tree or other object of support. At such time he covered his face with a handkerchief and slept, and, after such a nap, he would pursue his way apparently as refreshed as though he had slept for hours. He was very uneasy when compelled to be quiet, and could not sit still for half an hour without feeling a sense of suffocation. He was a very amiable man, a favorite with all who knew him, and was made much of by his royal patrons.

In 1833 he started from Munich at 1 p. m., June 6, with dispatches from the King of Bavaria to his son Otto, King of Greece. These dispatches were delivered at Nauplia at 9 a. m. on July 1; or seven days sooner than if they had been sent by the regular post. In 1836, while in the employ of the British East India Company, Mensen was charged with the conveying of dispatches from Calcutta to Constantinople, through Central Asia. The distance is 5,615 miles, which the messenger accomplished in fifty-nine days, or in one-third of the time made by the swiftest caravan. On this wonderful journey he made his way across terrible deserts, awful salt swamps, where, for hundreds of miles, he saw no living being, and through countries whose inhabitants were savage robbers, and who lived in a state of continual warfare. The man seemed invested with supernatural powers, and his fame spread far and wide. One of the most interesting problems of the age being the discovery of the sources of the Nile, it was suggested that this wonderful man be employed to follow the course of the river to its sources, and thus determine them. Prince Puckler Muskau, who had himself traveled extensively in Egypt, and had made several unsuccessful attempts to penetrate to the headwaters of the Nile, offered to defray all expenses and reward Mensen handsomely if he would undertake the trip. The indefatigable runner consented to make the attempt, and on May 11, 1842, set out from Muskau, in Silesia, whence he ran to Jerusalem, where he had some business to attend to. Thence he continued his way to Cairo and up the western bank of the Nile, through Lower and Middle and into Upper Egypt. Here, just outside the village of Sayne, he was seen on the morning of January 22, 1843, to stop and rest, leaning against a palm tree, with his face covered by a handkerchief. He rested so long that some persons tried to wake him, but they tried in vain, for he was dead. He was buried at the foot of the tree, and it was years before his friends in Europe knew what fate had befallen him.

A Bad Bond.

Golley Bond eloped with a neighbor's daughter in Bartlett, Tenn. Her father pursued them on horseback, and, as they traveled in a heavy carriage, soon overtook them. Bond refused to give up his bride, and, when the old man tried to take her by force, shot him through the heart. Then he mounted the dead man's horse, seated the girl behind him, and fled; but she insisted on returning to where her father's body lay, and he permitted her to do so, himself escaping to Texas. He was subsequently captured, but the tragic result of the elopement had crazed him, and he goes to an insane asylum instead of to trial.

A Postal Card on Its Travels.

Jules Verne's "Around the World in Eighty Days" will likely be outdone in point of time yet. We were shown a postal-card yesterday by Mr. Edward G. Hofmann, at the Monongahela House, which is a curiosity, and, if no accident occurs now, will have made the trip around the world in seventy-six days. The postal was sent by Mr. Emil Neef, editor of the Tagleblatt, in Zofingen, Switzerland, to a friend, Mr. Jean Roulet, in Calcutta, India, on the 23d of January, with a request to send it from there to Mr. Hofmann, of Pittsburgh, without losing any time, so that it can be ascertained how long it took it to go around the world. It arrived in Calcutta at 10 o'clock a. m., on the 16th of February, consuming twenty-four days on its trip there. In 15 minutes thereafter it was given to the post again, and by mail steamer brought across the Pacific ocean, and, via San Francisco, it reached Mr. Hofmann yesterday, taking thirty days to come here from Calcutta, and sixty-two days since it left Switzerland. It was immediately re-directed to Mr. Neef. It is expected that it will reach him in, at the farthest, fourteen days, as that is the regular time, and sometimes it takes less time for a letter to get there from Pittsburgh. Thus, if no accident occurs now, it will have gone around the world in seventy-six days, four days less than Jules Verne's "Phineas Fogg" required.—Pittsburgh Gazette.

Newspaper Wit.

There is much genuine wit floating in the newspapers, and much that is bogus to the last degree. When the Camden Post says "A man's character is like a fence—you cannot strengthen it by whitewash," it gives a genuine epigram. Quite as felicitous, too, is "Otis," in the Cincinnati Breakfast Table: "A tack points heavenward when it means the most mischief; it has many human imitators." A bright turn to a familiar quotation is given by the Biddeford Miniature thus: "I am thy father's spirit, as the pint flask said to the inquisitive urchin who had been investigating the cupboard." Mr. Talmage having claimed that hell has four gates, the Buffalo Express hopes they open outward, so as to give egress in case of fire. The Hackensack Republican said last fall, "The leaves of trees, like summer boarders with bills unpaid, take their departure, leaving their trunks behind them."

Pete's Revenge.

Pete McCartney, formerly a very successful counterfeiter, has for three years been a convict in the Illinois State prison, where he is to remain seven years longer. On being convicted, he gave $10,000 to his pretty wife, to live on until he could rejoin her, and she promised to wait faithfully for his release; but she lately made up her mind to get a divorce from him and marry Dr. Mason, with whom she had fallen in love. McCartney learned of her inconstancy, and determined to have his revenge. He employed accomplices to involve the physician in a charge of passing counterfeit money, and then went on the stand as a witness for the prosecution with a story of former partnership in the printing of bogus treasury notes. The prisoner only got out of the scrape by bringing a score of patients to prove an alibi.

A Mathematical Mule.

The Salt Lake Herald tells of a remarkable mule that is driven on one of the street-car lines of Salt Lake City, and that is required to make five round trips every morning before a change of teams occurs. As the fifth trip draws to a close, the sagacious animal stretches its neck and looks for the team that is to relieve it; and, if it does not see any waiting at the end of the route, begins to whinny in a way that is as intelligible as words could be. What the editor of the Herald wants to know is where that street-car mule learned its arithmetic, and how it succeeds in keeping such accurate tally of the number of trips that it makes.

FARM NOTES.

ABOUT half the weight of bones is mineral matter—lime combined with phosphoric acid, forming phosphate of lime, a substance which abounds in the ash of grains and of wood, and is no doubt the reason why a portion of wood ashes is beneficial for swine.—Des Moines Register.

A SOLUTION of an ounce of gum aloes, powdered, and a large table-spoonful of common soda, to each half-gallon of boiling water, is said to be useful in ridding young cabbage and other plants of insects, sprinkled from a can with a very fine rose, or, in the case of but few plants, from a rubber spraying bag.

QUIT brooding over your troubles, misfortunes and losses. A brave man, with a soul in him worth anything, gets out of such pitiful ruts and laughs at discouragements—rolls up his sleeves, whistles and sings, and makes the best of life. This earth is not paradise—you are only on the road there, if you take the right direction.—Iowa State Register.

POULTRY will pick up lime, etc., in order to form the shells of their eggs; they will eat feathers to obtain a supply of albumen to furnish plumage, and gravel to assist in grinding their food. When we shut up animals in their pens or stalls, we ought to furnish them with the substances which their instinct points out as necessary to their health and vigor.

THE Journal of Forestry gives the following description of a pear tree still productive near the village of Eardiston, England, with no evidence of decay: Height, 56 feet; girth of stem at ground level, 14 feet; girth at 5 feet up, 12 feet; height of stem to first large branch, 11 feet; diameter of spread of branches, 62 feet, giving a circumference of head of branches of about 182 feet.

A CORRESPONDENT of an exchange has tried soaking seed corn in a solution of chloride of lime with satisfactory results. He says of it: "By soaking seed corn seven hours in a very strong decoction of chloride of lime, corn can be forced ahead to maturity two or three weeks sooner than it will mature otherwise; besides he thinks it renders the seeds almost proof against the depredations of gophers. The lime warms up the germ of the seed and sends it up quickly, giving it two or three weeks the start of corn planted in the ordinary way, thereby insuring against the frost at the close of the season."

A CORRESPONDENT of Colman's Rural World, writing from Mountain Home, Ark., gives the following remedy for black-leg in cattle: "I have cured several of my own, and also some of my neighbors'. I lost five or six head before I could find a remedy for them. I will not describe the disease, for all stock men know how it affects cattle. By keeping a close watch I can tell very near as soon as they are taken, and then I give them three or four teaspoonfuls of soda, from one-half to one pint of sweet milk and from one-half to one pint of molasses, all put into a bottle and drench them; also, bathe spine and leg with spirits of turpentine.' I do this when they are first taken. This remedy will cure if given in time; but will not if they have been sick for some four or five hours. About three drenchings and one bathing of spine and legs will be enough for one day."

VERY many farmers, and many otherwise good dairymen, seem to think that they may save money by turning their cows upon the pastures on the first appearance of grass, and that thereafter all the feed given at home is thrown away. There is nothing more fallacious. If you have plenty of pasture, and it will not poach under foot, give the stock a chance at it by all means, but do not fail to give the usual feed night and morning so long as they will eat. The young grass will tend to clear the system of humor, and act as an alternate to other food given. It will also quickly improve the color and flavor of butter. If pasture is not plenty, it is far better to keep them in the yards until the grass grows to a fair bite. It is the worst possible policy to try and save hay and grain in the spring between fodder and grass. Such stock will show this false economy all through the season.—Prairie Farmer.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

PAINTED PAILS.—Avoid using pails that have been painted on the inside; they are dangerous. Water that has stood in such a vessel for a few hours is capable of poisoning all who partake of it.

BIRD CAGES.—It is not safe to keep birds in painted wire cages, especially in warm weather. The paint softens in the heated atmosphere, and the birds are apt to nibble it, and to become poisoned thereby. Unpainted brass cages are the best for keeping birds.

HOUSE PLANTS.—Mix a few tablespoonfuls of charcoal with the earth in your flower-pots, and you will be surprised at the invigorating effect upon the choice and delicate plants. The color of the flowers is greatly increased in richness by the use of charcoal.

TO PREVENT RUST.—To preserve bright grates or fire-irons from rust, make a strong paste of fresh lime and water, and, with a fine brush, smear it as thickly as possible over all the polished surface requiring preservation. By this simple means all the grates and fire-irons in an empty house may be kept for months free from harm without further care or attention.

SUNNY ROOMS.—Light is one of the most active agencies in enlivening and beautifying home. We all know the value of sunlight as a health-giving agent to the physical constitution, and it is not less so to our moral and spiritual nature. Take the airiest, choicest and sunniest room in the house for the living room. Dark rooms bring depression of spirits and chill the energies, but a light room is good cheer.

PERSONAL CLEANLINESS.—We may as certainly gauge the mortality of a country by the condition of the women and children, by the beauty or disorder of the homes, and the respect or disdain for personal cleanliness and adornment, as we may learn by the existence of railroads, or the frequency of telegraphs, where a country stands in relation to advanced civilization.

SUGGESTIONS ABOUT SEWING.—Here are a few that may be useful to young seamstresses: Should you have a rent in a dress to repair use ravelings of the same material; they are easily to be obtained from the top of the skirt, if you have no pieces; but generally some are left by the dressmaker, and should be kept for such accidents. In making a shirt, the sleeves should be put in before the collar is put on. The space into which the sleeves is gathered at the arm hole should be exactly the same as the length of the waist-band round. The length of the shoulder is sometimes one-eighth yard and sometimes one-eighth and a nail, as may best fit the wearer. Your pattern will guide you to this, as also with regard to your shirt-front.

Button holes require great skill in making. Bars of thread should be first formed around the hole and neatly overcast, just the depth of the edge. They should be neatly overcast about three or four threads deep, broad work in them looking very coarse and clumsy. In working button holes, take care to throw the thread forward before catching up the loop on the needle. Gather with strong thread, waxed with white wax.

If you can make a shirt well, you can easily manufacture all female undergarments; you will require only patterns for cutting out.

Longcloth and linen should be scalded before you work on them, in order to render them soft enough for the needle to pass through easily; but should you be unable, from haste or other circumstances, to have this done, take a cake of soap, and rub it on the part you are going to sew or hem; you will find your needle will then slip along with the greatest ease, and will run no risk of breaking it.

Young ladies who have the care of their own linen, and perhaps have their own allowance for dress, should take a few hours on a fixed day, weekly, to look over their clothes and do any small repairs that may be wanted. They will find the truth of this wise old adage, "A stitch in time saves nine," and will make their linen last as long again as it would otherwise do.

In washing new embroidery, after it is cut out, pour boiling water upon it, let it stand from twenty minutes to half an hour, rub lightly with the hands, dry, and press on the wrong side. This takes out the stiffening so that the machine does not cut it.

To remove grease which has come off the sewing-machine from new fabrics, before washing them rub the spots thoroughly with hard soap, dip in cold water and rub again. If not removed, apply more soap and repeat the operation.

American Agriculture.

The possibilities of American agriculture can best be appreciated by reviewing the facts that the area of arable lands in the United States exceeds 1,500,000,000 square miles, while the area at present under cultivation is estimated to be 174,900,000 acres, or less than 275,000 square miles. It is probable that the next census will show a valuation of farms exceeding $11,000,000,000, and an annual production of $3,000,000,000. The fact that more then one-half of all our people who are engaged in the ordinary pursuits of life are directly employed in agriculture is at once a sufficient evidence of its universality and importance.

In the year 1878 there were 51,008,000 acres in Indian corn, producing 1,371,000,000 bushels; 32,208,000 in wheat, with a yield of 422,000,000 bushels; 13,176,000 in oats, giving 411,855,000 bushels; 1,790,000 in barley, showing a crop of 42,000,000 bushels; 1,621,000 in rye, with 25,800,000 bushels, and 673,000 acres in buckwheat, yielding a product of 12,277,000 bushels. Thus the total cereal production for 1878 was 2,284,902,000 bushels, raised on 100,476,000 acres, while in 1874 the total crops were but 1,454,180,200 bushels; in 1876, 1,962,821,600, and in 1877, 2,178,934,646 bushels. The future increase in the farm productions of this country will result largely from improved systems of cultivation, as well as from extended areas under the plow. A system of agriculture presents but little to be proud of which averages to the acre over the whole country a yield of but twelve bushels of wheat, less than twenty-seven bushels of corn, and only twenty-eight bushels of oats. Compared with what modern agriculture is capable of in this direction, it is not too much to affirm that our farm crops, even on their present area, may be doubled in quantity.—American Cultivator.

Making Gold Lace.

One of the most singular mechanics operations imaginable is the making of gold wire for what is known as gold lace. The refiner first prepares a solid rod of silver about an inch in thickness; he heats this rod, applies upon the surface a sheet of gold leaf, burnishes this down—and so on, until the gold is about one-hundredth part the thickness of the silver. The rod is then subjected to a train of processes which brings it down to the state of fine wire, when it is passed through holes in a steel plate lessening step by step in diameter. The gold never deserts the silver, but adheres closely to it, and shares all its mutations; it is one hundredth part the thickness of the silver at the beginning, and it maintains the same ratio to the end. As to the thinness to which the gold-coated rod of silver can be brought, the limit depends on the delicacy of human skill. It has been calculated, however, that the gold actually placed on the very finest silver wire for gold lace is not more then one-third of one-millionth of an inch in thickness; that is, not above one-tenth the thickness of ordinary gold-leaf.

SHALL THE BALLOT BE FREE?

The Real Issue Before Congress and the People.

Speech of Hon. Frank Hurd, of Ohio, in the House of Representatives.

MR. CHAIRMAN: By the seventh section of the first article of the constitution it is provided that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." In the Forty-fifth Congress the House of Representatives, in the exercise of its unquestioned power, passed the Army bill and the Legislative bill appropriating nearly fifty millions of money for the uses of the Government. To these bills they added certain provisions germane to their subject-matter and in the interest of economy which repealed provisions of the existing statutes, most of which had been incorporated into the law of the land by being in the first instance attached to appropriation bills. These bills, when sent to the Senate, were amended, as that body had the undoubted power to do, by striking out these provisions to which I have referred. They went to committees of conference. Not having been a member of one of the committees of conference, nor familiar with the necessities of legislation at that time pending, I am unable to say what the propositions for settlement and adjustment of the differences between the two houses were. I have heard it said upon the floor of this House that certain distinguished representatives of the Republican party were willing to concede very much to the wishes of the House, only insisting that there should be one amendment left out. These gentlemen had not power to speak for the body which differed with this House, and I do not know that any proposition was made by the Senate of the United States for a compromise. I do not know that as a result of the disagreement of the committees of conference an extra session was called. I will not now discuss the question as to who is to be blamed for the extra session excepting in the general discussion of the propositions that are involved in this debate. If the House were right in insisting upon these provisions, then the Senate was wrong in compelling an extra session. If the Senate were right in refusing to accept the propositions of the House, then the House was wrong, and I propose, in the few remarks that I shall submit to the consideration of this body to-day, to attempt to show that the House was right in every proposition which it insisted upon in the Forty-fifth Congress and which it insists upon now in the legislation of the Forty-sixth.

Nor shall I discuss the method by which these amendments or provisions have been attempted to be made parts of the appropriation bills. If anything has been settled by the legislation of the last quarter of a century, it is that even general legislation may be tacked to appropriation bills; and certainly no man, at any time in the history of this Government, has disputed the proposition that measures in the interest of economy, propositions relating to the revenue, might be incorporated into bills when they were originated by the House, under the authority of the section to which I have referred.

Who was right? Who is right now? I say, Mr. Chairman, that the House of Representatives was right in insisting that these bills should be repealed. I shall not speak to-day of the Test-Oath bill. I shall speak only of the two others which relate to elections, because they both are governed by the same principles, and both must be settled by the same constitutional doctrine.

The House of Representatives insisted that the law should be amended so as to strike out that part which authorized the use of troops at the polls; that the law should be amended so that Supervisors of Elections appointed by Federal authority should no longer possess the power they now have; and that there should be a repeal of all the statutes which conferred upon officers of the United States the power to interfere with or regulate State elections. The House was right, and it is right in the demand it makes now, because, first, these provisions are unconstitutional. They interfere with the right of suffrage; they attempt the control of voting in a State in the Union where by the laws of the State the voting power alone is conferred. Have gentlemen who have considered this question read recently section 2, article 1, of the constitution of the United States, which declares that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

It is the most numerous branch of the State Legislature that determines the qualifications of electors and not the constitution of the United States. There is no such thing as the right of suffrage for a citizen of the United States. The right of suffrage is possessed and enjoyed by a citizen of a State under the laws created by the State expressly recognized by the fundamental law of the land.

And, if any doubt upon this subject had ever been entertained, I ask you to refer to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States recently made, in which every doubt is taken away:

"The power of Congress—"

I read from 2 Otto, page 215, the syllabus of the case—

"The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment, and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at such elections is because of his color, race, or previous condition of servitude."

The highest judicial tribunal of the United States has determined that there is no power in the Congress of the United States to interfere with voting at the State elections excepting in the single instance where the power was conferred upon the General Government by the Fifteenth amendment to the constitution.

Now, on what theory, I ask you, does this legislation of which I speak rest? On what theory does the United States Government send troops to the polls at a State election? On what theory do Supervisors of Elections stand at the polls to supervise and interfere with State elections? Only upon this: that the right of suffrage is a right guaranteed by the constitution of the United States, in the exercise of which it is the business of Congress to protect the citizen. But, as I have shown you by the express phraseology of the constitution, and by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, no such right does exist to be protected by the constitution of the United States and by the legislation of Congress. And, therefore, is not the conclusion inevitable and irresistible that any legislation upon the subject is unconstitutional?

I know that gentlemen undertake to sustain the constitutionality of this legislation by referring to a provision of the constitution, article 1, section 4:

"The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The manifest and true construction of this provision is that, in the event of the people of a State failing to make provision on these subjects, Congress, in the exercise of its discretion, may make regulations on the subject, and that when States make regulations Congress may alter them as to "the time, places and manner of holding elections."

Who are the voters? They are determined by section 2, which I have already read. They are the persons who can vote under the law of a State and possess the qualifications requisite as voters of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The time of holding the election, the place of holding the election, the manner of holding the election, may be provided by Congress in the cases which I have suggested, but, when the time and places of holding the elections are fixed, what power remains?

The manner of voting may be determined, whether it is to be viva voce or by ballot, as Congress may decide, and this view is abundantly justified by the debates in the Constitutional Convention and in the various conventions of the States which ratified the constitution originally, and the speech of Mr. Iredell, of the State of North Carolina, is unanswerable, who said that it never was intended or designed to give the power over the elections in the States to Congress, only the regulation of the time, places, and methods of voting. It has been contended in the progress of this argument that the power over this subject may be derived from that provision of the constitution which authorizes Congress to guarantee to every State a republican form of government and to send troops to suppress domestic violence on the call of the Executive in the absence of the Legislature, or of the Legislature of a State.

There may be such domestic violence at the polls that the Governor of the State, if the Legislature be not in session, would be bound to call upon the President of the United States for assistance, and in such cases as that the power of the Government can be properly exercised; but the ground on which the power is exercised is, that it is at the request of the authorities of the State. The troops of the United States have no business at the polls except to suppress of violence or for repelling invasion at the request of the State authorities, the State authorities having first indicated to the General Government the desire of assistance. Is not this very clause to which I have referred an additional argument in favor of the position that this law is unconstitutional? The troops of the United States can only be used to suppress domestic violence or repel foreign invasion, and here is a law which proposes to send troops to the polls at any time, at the order of anybody, without any request of the State authorities; and it is the plainest violation of that provision of the constitution which directs the only way in which the troops of the United States shall be sent to a State.

The constitution thereby prohibited any other way of sending troops to a State. I say, then, that these provisions should be repealed because they are in direct conflict with the fundamental law of the country and in the plainest violation of an expressed adjudication of the highest judicial tribunal of the land.

In the second place, these laws should be repealed because they introduce a dangerous method and practice into the conducting of elections and the administration of justice. They authorize men to interfere with the election of the local officers of the State. In the State of Ohio, and I believe in most of the States of the Union, the law is that all officers shall be voted for on a general ticket—State officers, county officers, municipal officers, township officers, and members of Congress.

In the State of Ohio every man whose name is on the ballot is voted for as an officer of the State, and yet this provision of this law proposes to put United States Supervisors to supervise the counting and casting of the votes for county officers and State officers. I submit that no such power was ever intended by the constitution of the United States to be conferred upon Congress; and I submit that the State cannot be shorn of her sovereignty in this way, as is claimed by the Republican party, by such a provision as this, without danger to its institutions.

What arises from the very section to which I have referred? Who are the voters? They are the persons whose qualifications are fixed by the constitution of the State, and, under this law, the Supervisors of Election are stationed at the polls, for what? If the law of Congress fixed the qualifications for the electors of a State, then it might be proper that the Federal Supervisors should be present to interpret and execute the laws; but, under what doctrine of constitutional law, on what principle of government, will you say that Supervisors appointed by the Federal Government, strangers to the laws of Ohio, shall stand at the polls and interpret our laws and execute them?

The third objection is that these supervising officers are armed with authority unknown in the history of the common law or State laws. They have authority at the polls on the day of the election to arrest, without warrant, any man whom they may suspect of being about to engage in a violation of the laws. There is no principle of common law or State law which can authorize the arrest of citizens on suspicion of an intention to commit an offense.

Here are men who honestly believe that they have the right to vote, and who, on going to the polls to deposit their ballots, are confronted with this extraordinary invasion of the rights of civil liberty and arrested, and, as in the city of New York, incarcerated in many instances for days. What an extraordinary scene was presented for a republican Government in the city of New York at the last election! Thousands of men who had failed to get out their naturalization papers in a way that suited the judgment of the Supervisor of Elections were arrested upon sight. At one time over 600 men were under arrest who had gone to the polls honestly believing that they had a right to vote. They had committed no breach of the peace; they had committed no felony. They had attempted to exercise what they believed to be their right and duty. Yet they were incarcerated and prevented from voting. Since that time a judicial tribunal to which the case was referred has determined that these men were not guilty; that they were innocent; that they were entitled to vote at the election.

A power so outrageous as that upon the right of suffrage and the exercise of the duties of a freeman, I venture to say, has not within this century been exercised before under any Government, monarchical or despotic.

I have finished what I desired to say upon my second point of objection to these measures and as a reason for their repeal; that is, that they introduce new and extraordinary methods for the control of elections and for the administration of justice.

Another point which I urge against them as a reason for their repeal, and one which so overshadowingly is greater than the others that I have been loath and hesitated to discuss them. It is that these measures in their very nature and essence are dangerous and destructive to civil liberty.

All history is full of warnings upon this subject. No republic which has ever perished from the face of the earth has gone to its grave save through military influence. The familiarization of the people through the army with the forms of despotism, the gradual abrogation of the forms of the republic, and the ultimate subversion of all civil government have marked the career of every republic from its birth to its grave, and shall we escape the force and application of the universal rule? Is power less sweet, are rights more sacred, are liberties more secure in this country, so that we can dare without harm to trifle with a danger that has wrought ruin everywhere before?

From lands where republics have died and where monarchies have been erected on their ruins; from lands where the contest for liberty is now going on; from lands where the shadow of despotism darkens every household and compels every citizen to seek shelter upon some foreign shore, helpless to free himself at home, there come the solemn notes of warning against military interference.

From the presence of troops at the polls to the control of elections by troops is but a single step. In that step free elections are gone; and free elections are the source of free government and the author and originator of its power. Troops at the polls mean intimidation of voters; troops at the polls mean as its result the registration of the will of the commander; troops at the polls mean the substitution of the bayonet for the ballot, the enthronement of the Commander-in-Chief, and the deposition of the President.

I have been astounded, as this debate has continued, to hear from gentlemen upon the other side arguments in favor of the use of troops at the polls, the last place in the world where such arguments should be heard; but my regret is lost in my joy when I recollect that the party of the army is not in power in this Congress.

It is objected to these measures of legislation which we propose that there is a possibility by our passing these laws of restraining the veto power of the President; or, as my distinguished friend from Ohio put it the other day, of "interfering with his participation in the legislation." I deny that the President of the United States has any right to participate in the legislation of this country.

All legislative power is vested in the Senate and the House of Representatives. The President may, if he is satisfied with a measure of legislation, affix his signature to it. If he does not put his name to it it becomes a law at the expiration of ten days under certain circumstances. If he vetoes it, it returns to the house where it originated and is made a law, not by his act, but by the vote of forty-three of the members of the two houses. He has nothing to do with the legislation of this country. Therefore, in the decision of a question relating to legislation, we must be governed by our own judgment and not by his opinion.

It has been said by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Garfield) that it means "revolution" for us to pass these bills as we propose. From the beginning of the Government has not the House originated revenue bills or appropriation bills? Has not the House been competent to pass a bill repealing a law which remains upon the statute book? The only question, then, is whether we have power to pass a provision for repeal as part of a law of appropriation, and that is a question of mere parliamentary practice and order, to be determined by the rules of the body itself.

"Revolution" to pass an appropriation bill! "Revolution" to repeal an objectionable statute! "Revolution" to incorporate into an appropriation bill a provision repealing a statute! No, no. In the exercise of inherent constitutional power the House does all this. If there be "revolution" it is in the suggestion which has come from the gentleman from Ohio. If there be "revolution" it is in the suggestions which have come from others of the distinguished leaders of the Republican party in this House. It is revolution against every theory of the constitution, the absolute overthrow of that instrument itself, for a member of this House, be he an intimate friend of the President or not, to threaten the House with a veto by the President if we dare pass such laws as we deem proper.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the majority of this House will be intimidated from their duty by the threat of any President, much less the threat of a President whose title to office is so doubtful, and whose tenure of office is as yet so uncertain.

Mr. Chairman, the sentence from the constitution with which I commenced my remarks I regard as so important in this discussion that I shall read it again:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

What does that mean? Why was it incorporated into the constitution of the United States? Was there ever any other Government that had a provision like that; and, if so, what was its history and to what uses was it applied? In English history we find that the House of Commons has power alone to originate money bills. Of what value that is, let me illustrate by reading from De Lolme on the constitution of England, one of the most brilliant French commentators on that instrument:

"The right to grant subsidies to the Crown, possessed by the people of England, is the safeguard of all their other liberties, religious and civil. It is a regular means, conferred on them by the constitution, of influencing the motion of the Executive, and it forms the tie by which the latter is bound to them."

It thus appears that the power of the House of Commons to originate money bills was, under the English constitution, a regular method of influencing the motion of the executive power. Do you suppose our fathers incorporated a corresponding provision into our constitution without understanding the uses to which it had been applied? Its purpose in English history was to influence the motion of executive power, and it had been used on many a memorable occasion in behalf of the civil and religious liberties of the English people.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, even what will be the action of this House upon this bill. I certainly do not know what will be the action of the President of the United States when the bill is submitted to him, if it shall pass, much less can I know what will be the action of the House when the bill may be returned to us with his objections. But this much I do know, that, if the power of withholding supplies shall be exercised, then never in all the contests for liberty in English history, never in all the victories which have made that little stormy island the center of civilization of the world, never in all the struggles for the rights of man was the power of holding supplies exercised more wisely than it will be when we exercise it to preserve the freedom of elections, to subordinate in times of peace the military power to the civil authority, and to preserve pure and uncontaminated the sources of free government.

A Dog Story.

A dog is a good thing to have around the house, and nobody is better convinced of this fact than the proprietor of a certain boarding-house on Grand River street east, not very far from Woodward avenue. It seems that the lady left a $5 bill upon the parlor table several days ago, while temporarily absent from the room, and when she returned the bill had disappeared. After a long and unsuccessful search it was noticed that the dog had a sneaking, hang-dog expression about the mouth, and did not seem inclined to wag his tail as numerously as usual. Somebody suggested that he might have swallowed the bill, and then it was remembered that he had been suspected of that sort of thing before. An emetic was administered, but the dog only howled and gagged, and stubbornly refused to show the "true inwardness" of his disposition. Another emetic was sent for, and finally the missing bill was vomited up with a small tempest of howls and gurgles, and penitential tears. Mrs. X. took the money to a bank and represented that it was soiled and ragged because it had been carried in somebody's pocket for a long time, and the bank was persuaded to take the bill at a liberal discount upon its original value.

Two or three days ago a bill was placed on the floor where the dog could see it, and then everybody left the room, expecting when they returned to see the dog and bill consolidated. But lo! the bill remained untouched, and the repentant canine lay curled up in a corner of the room looking as ashamed and miserable as any human being would have looked under the circumstances.—Detroit News.

A Big Battle-Picture.

A gigantic picture, representing the battle of Waterloo, is in course of execution at Brussels. The canvas measures 115 metres in circumference and 14½ metres in height, so that its superfices represents 1,667½ square metres. The artists, who are under the direction of M. Castellani, are installed in one of the vast workshops of the Pauwels Company. The painting is done a third at a time. The portion now under the brush is that on which the Belle-Alliance farmstead is shown, with the corpses of Highlanders and French lying thick on the ground, a spot where a desperate struggle took place. Further on we see the battalions of the Guard executing their last charge, and then forming the celebrated square. Napoleon, on his white horse, is in the center of the square, surrounded by his staff.

"Was ye iver in Jersey in the summer sason?" said an Irishman to a friend. "'Pon me soul, I was onct, an' I thought I wud be davoured. It was a hot night, an' I raised me winder to catch a whiff of braze, an', instead, I was attacked by a million of murderin' divils wid prongs in 'em. It was a slap here an' a kick there an' a scratch ivery-where. When completely exhausted wid 'em, I giv' up me body for to feast the cannibals, whin, bad luck to thim! the murderin' imps commenced singing in me ear, 'We won't go home till mornin'.' An' well they kept their word, bad luck to thim! ses I to meself', as I carried me skeleton out o' the house in the mornin'."

Is the first cuckoo, when he comes with love.
Sadder than birds on sunless summer eves,

The long nails had grown into the flesh of the beast, at one time causing him a severe attack of lockjaw.

PERSONS fond of statistics may be delighted to know that one day recently a man on the top of the Custom House in Newburyport, Mass., counted sixty-five fishing vessels. Each vessel, he estimated, carried eight men; each man attended to about 800 hooks; so, if his figures were correct, about 416,000 hooks were hanging aggravatingly on that day before the noses of the hungry codfish on the little strip of New England coast within the line of his vision.

AUBURN, INDIANA, APR. 17, 1879

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY,
EDITORS.

The Columbia City Post, one of our best and favorite exchanges, in the issue of last week notes a change in its affairs. Mr. E. W. Brown, who has conducted the paper so satisfactorily for a number of years and who will continue as senior editor and partner, has sold a half-interest in the office to Mr. J. W. Adams, a young man whose qualifications for the position are well known in that region. The COURIER wishes the Post, under the new regime, all the success and prosperity the newspaperial business can bestow.

The Waterloo Press says we ought to know, "that a democrat now holds the office of Superintendent, in this county, at the hands of republican trustees. This goes to show that DeKalb republicans are not near so ready to drag partisan politics into school affairs, as some other people, especially Mr. Reed and his kind of democrats."

This also goes to show that the republican party must have been mighty hard up for timber, or the trustees would not have gone to the democratic party to find a good man to fill the position. If the same thing should occur next June, there will be a very sick republican in Auburn.

"KIND WORDS."

Several Out of a Few.

[Ligonier Banner.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of the judge, has become associated with Mr. Reed in the publication of the Auburn COURIER. He is said to be a talented young man.

[Columbia City Commercial.]

Theodore Reed has associated with him in the publication of the Auburn COURIER, Robert J. Lowry. The COURIER is one of our best and favorite exchanges.

[Valparaiso Messenger.]

Robert J. Lowry of Ft. Wayne, has become associate editor of the Auburn COURIER, the democratic organ in DeKalb county. Success to friend Robert.

[Hicksville News.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Lowry, of Ft. Wayne, has purchased an interest in the Auburn COURIER. We welcome Mr. Lowry to the quill tribe. The COURIER is one of the best papers in Indiana.

[Garrett Herald.]

We met Mr. Robert Lowry, who has lately associated himself with Mr. Reed in the publication of the Auburn COURIER, this week, and were glad to form his acquaintance and welcome him to the editorial fraternity of DeKalb county.

[Bentonville (Ark.) Advance.]

R. J. Lowry, who for more than a year was connected with this office, is now one of the editors of the Auburn (Ind.) COURIER, a neat forty-eight column paper. Bob can get up as good a local as anybody of his size and age.

[Kendallville Standard.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Lowry of Ft. Wayne, has purchased an interest in the Auburn COURIER and assumed the duties as one of the editors of that paper. We extend a cordial greeting to Mr Lowry, and welcome him as a member of the press gang.

[Albion New Era.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Robert Lowry, has become one of the editors of the Auburn COURIER. The judge is an ex-journalist with whom we at one time made an engagement to learn the "art preservative," but was prevailed upon to attend school instead.

[Columbia City Post.]

We note by last week's issue of the Auburn COURIER that Mr. Reed has associated with him in the editorial and business management of that paper Mr. Robert J. Lowry. "Rob." is a son of Judge Lowry, of Ft. Wayne, and a young man of much promise in the newspaper guild. Success to the COURIER under its new management.

[Decatur Union.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Lowry, of Ft. Wayne, has lately associated himself with the Auburn COURIER. Messrs. Lowry & Reed will, undoubtedly, make the COURIER a weighty missile in the campaign of 1880. We have no reason to believe, however, that it will be fair and just in its work, and not given entirely to party abuse. The Union wishes the COURIER an abundance of success.

Sabbath-School Institute.

The Richland township S. S. teacher's institute will hold their third quarterly meeting on Saturday, April 26, 1879, at the U. B. church, one-half mile south of Sedan. Following is the

PROGRAMME:

1. Parental attendance—how to gain and maintain, by Rev. Snyder, of Waterloo. 2. Model class, taught by Rev. L. Harding. 3. Lesson-leaves—benefits derived therefrom, by Mrs. M. Chaffee, of Corunna. 4. What great gulf divides the Sunday-school from the church? by Rev. A. W. Burns of Butler. 5. Quarterly institutes and children's meetings—benefits to the Sunday-school, by Rev. L. Rice, of Auburn. 6. Question drawer. All Sunday-school workers are most urgently requested to attend.

COMMITTEE.

The Grant Movement has Reached Auburn.

A few weeks since announcements were made through the newspapers of this place that steps were being taken for the organization of a soldiers' association. We were not advised as to who the leaders of the movement were, but a list of the temporary officers as published in the republican papers, showed only the names of republicans, which induced us to believe that the movement was purely political; still, we did not express an opinion through the COURIER, fearing that we might possibly be mistaken, and as our sympathies are with the good and true men who risked their lives to preserve the Union, the writer was inclined to regard with favor an organization as a band of brothers, NOT SOLDIERS, (for we are all citizens now), who could meet at stated times and recount the many happy scenes enjoyed, and the many hardships and privations endured as comrades and defenders of our country—be to one another friends and helpers, and keep alive that kindly and cordial feeling which was characteristic of the army. The meetings of such an organization would cause renewed hope for the continuance of peace and liberty in a glorious country, and for the prosperity and happiness for ourselves, our families and our posterity. Such, however, are not the objects of the association now about to be organized in Auburn. Our informant says that on last Saturday evening a meeting was held for the purpose of adopting a constitution and by-laws, the same having been prepared by a committee and presented for adoption, with a preamble setting forth that the soldier is indebted to the republican party for everything he has received from 1861 until the present time; that the republican party is the only hope of the country, &c., &c. The preamble as submitted by the committee was the subject of considerable discussion by the republican members. Mr. McIntosh being the leader in defending the preamble, who made use of the most vile and insulting language, of which the following are only a few of the unreasonable insinuations and infamous falsehoods uttered by him; viz: That the democratic party is too liberal in pensioning soldiers. That the soldiers of the south will soon receive the same pensions as those of the north. That the confederate bonds will be paid. That the time is coming when the soldiers will be expected to do something, and they must be prepared to act. That the soldiers of the north fought to free the slaves. That Gen's. McClellan and Potter were traitors to their county. That the people of the south trail the stars and stripes in the dust, and despise the northern soldier. Mr. McIntosh insisted that the association should be organized in the interest of the republican party, otherwise he would have nothing to do with it. In other words, he cares nothing about the soldiers, unless they can be made to subserve the interests of the most corrupt party that ever disgraced any country. Other republican members of the association were not so frank as to admit that the object of the association was to aid their party politically, and preferred to have the preamble amended, asserting in their arguments that they could accomplish more for the party by leaving the preamble and consititution in such a shape that it would not disclose the object of the organization. Mr. Weamer was particularly anxious to have it understood that he was a thoroughbred radical; he said he would rather be shot at by every person in the room, than have it said that he had any sympathy for the rebels in congress, and, that if he thought there was a drop of democratic blood in his veins he would let it out; he thought it would be policy to say nothing about politics in the preamble. The chairman of the meeting (Mr. Culbertson) undertook to explain, and in so doing "let the cat out of the bag," when he said, "it seems that the preamble and articles of the constitution were formed by the republican party," (cries of no! no! from the committee). If Mr. Culbertson had said that the forms were furnished by Grant's campaign committee, he would have hit the mark exactly. If soldiers of the late war who now belong to the republican party deem it necessary to form an organization for the benefit of Grant or any other republican, it is their privilege to do so, but we advise democrats who were soldiers to have nothing to do with any such an organization. We can see no cause for exciting war prejudices; the clash of arms has been hushed by the angel of peace; battle flags are laid away; we have one government and one country; time is healing the wounds of the nation, caused by a civil war. So let it be. The boys in blue fought a good fight—built their monuments more enduring that the pyramids, and thousands of them lay down in death. Earth's flora decorates their graves; the winds, in their tenderness, make harps of leaf and spray, and chant an everlasting requiem above their inanimate dust. The survivors are honored; those maimed are pensioned; and generous impulses, kind words, fraternity, unity, peace and good will should prevail.

The Columbia City Post, of last week, gives the Indianian the following well merited hit: "It may be that it is none of our business, but we nevertheless suggest that the Indianian can find room for at least a column more of "interesting matter" each week if it will just crowd out those "compliments" of itself. Self praise can be ever done."

[illegible] During the last [illegible] months have been testing, with uniformly successful results, the value of a very simple method of treating such infantile complaints as atrophy, bronchitis, convulsions, diarrhea, febrile disturbances generally, and indeed [illegible] disorders of childhood wh[illegible] are [illegible] by an unnatural state of the skin.

"The treatment simply [illegible] in smearing w[illegible] salad oil [illegible] whole surface of the body, from the crown of the head to the tips of the [illegible] toes, the process being repeated every twelve, six, or even four hours, according to the urgency of the case. Of course, the use of a long flannel gown or small blanket is obvious, and the fluid should be slightly warmed.

"The application of oil possesses the following immense advantages over the ordinary warm bath:

"1. Skin-action is more completely and permanently restored.

"2. The danger of [illegible] is avoided, for there is no sudden change of temperature; and, moreover, the sheet of oil protects the surface from atmospheric influences.

"3. It acts as a [illegible]-food, not only preventing waste of tissue, but actually increasing the bulk of the little patient.

"4. It does not depress, but, on the contrary, appears to exhilarate.

"It will scarcely be credited by many that the formidable affections above mentioned will frequently yield to this treatment, or, at any rate, show signs of abatement in from twenty minutes to four and twenty hours: but such is the case, though sometimes forty-eight or even seventy-two hours will elapse before any decided signs of improvement occur."

Soldiers' Graves in Private Cemeteries.

The following circular from Capt. A. F. Rockwell, of the U. S. army, who has charge of the national cemeteries, has been furnished the press of the north for publication:

"It is probably generally remembered that some years ago—in 1873—congress passed a law providing for the erection of durable headstones over the graves of soldiers of the regular and volunteer forces of the United States whose remains are entered in the national military cemeteries. This law has been carried out, and the graves of the Nation's dead in these cemeteries are now permanently marked. At the [illegible] of the war department, congress has recently authorized the erection of similar headstones over the graves of the Union soldiers who are buried in private and village cemeteries. This will be done as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. In the meantime the Quartermaster General, at Washington, will at once proceed to collect the necessary information as to where these headstones are required.

All persons having any knowledge of the burial places of soldiers in private cemeteries whose graves are not marked, are requested to communicate the fact to the Quartermaster General, and give regiment, company, and date of death of deceased, if known. Similar information is desired from parties in charge of such cemeteries.

Of course it is not intended to furnish headstones for graves over which monuments have already been erected by relatives or friends of the deceased."

Advertising.

What is advertising?

The art of exciting curiosity.

What is curiosity?

A feeling of inquisitiveness, which nothing short of investigation or trial will satisfy.

What is the result of creating this feeling?

Prosperity and riches to the advertiser.

Who are the most inquisitive people in the world?

The American people. (If you don't believe this, ask Barnum's What Is It, or the old man himself.)

Ergo, if you would succeed in advertising, excite curiosity, and our word for it, backed by years of experience and observation, you will hit the mark every time.

Grafting Eyes upon the Blind.

To the Editor of the Scientific American:

In our community, as elsewhere, there are large numbers of blind persons because [illegible] the mechanism of the optic nerve is unable to [illegible] the influence of light; this is often the case when the [illegible] imperfect [illegible] communication to the brain. This is an established fact of ocular science.

It is also true that where a finger may be entirely severed from the hand, by accident or otherwise, if taken in season, replaced and properly [illegible] in [illegible] and it skillfully treated, [illegible] result; this has been [illegible] Now, there can be [illegible] the nerve fibers [illegible] fingers are susceptible [illegible] sate sensations. The practice of grafting is also common [illegible] is the transfusion of blood [illegible] healthy person's veins to [illegible] the foregoing is admitted, [illegible] reason [illegible] proper [illegible] observed, a sound, healthy eye could not be ingrafted on the muscles and nerves, which had previously been severed from an imperfect eye?

In this and all other communities there are annually, [illegible]nightly or weekly numbers of criminals put to death under sentence of capital punishment. Whatever may be said of the moral condition of these criminals, it is certain that their physical condition is usually good. The question may here arise, do these unfortunate persons possess anything that may be preserved and become useful to the humanity they have outraged? It would, of course seem cruel and inhuman even to propose the extraction of the eyes, or other essential organs, before death, or where there was a possibility of the individual regaining consciousness.

But in this connection we may ask if it is necessary to perpetuate the time honored (or rather dishonored) mode of executing criminals by strangulation; or would it seem any more inhuman to civilized beings to cause death by means of chloroform or ether? If not, could not the criminal who is to give up his life, and the patient who is blind, be placed under the influence of ether at the same time, and the transfer effected before life becomes extinct on the part of the criminal? This at least would be a painless way of expiating the sentence of the law.

As a matter of course, doubtless, many patient and delicate experiments would have to be performed before the plan here proposed could be brought to success; but such experiments, I think, may be performed on dumb animals, using every precaution to prevent unnecessary suffering. D. A. REARDON,

Gen. Sup't

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, APR. 17, 1879

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY,
EDITORS.

The Columbia City Post, one of our best and favorite exchanges, in the issue of last week notes a change in its affairs. Mr. E. W. Brown, who has conducted the paper so satisfactorily for a number of years and who will continue as senior editor and partner, has sold a half-interest in the office to Mr. J. W. Adams, a young man whose qualifications for the position are well known in that region. The COURIER wishes the Post, under the new regime, all the success and prosperity the newspaperial business can bestow.

The Waterloo Press says we ought to know, "that a democrat now holds the office of Superintendent, in this county, at the hands of republican trustees. This goes to show that DeKalb republicans are not near so ready to drag partisan politics into school affairs, as some other people, especially Mr. Reed and his kind of democrats."

This also goes to show that the republican party must have been mighty hard up for timber, or the trustees would not have gone to the democratic party to find a good man to fill the position. If the same thing should occur next June, there will be a very sick republican in Auburn.

"KIND WORDS."

Several Out of a Few.

[Ligonier Banner.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of the judge, has become associated with Mr. Reed in the publication of the Auburn COURIER. He is said to be a talented young man.

[Columbia City Commercial.]

Theodore Reed has associated with him in the publication of the Auburn COURIER, Robert J. Lowry. The COURIER is one of our best and favorite exchanges.

[Valparaiso Messenger.]

Robert J. Lowry of Ft. Wayne, has become associate editor of the Auburn COURIER, the democratic organ in DeKalb county. Success to friend Robert.

[Hicksville News.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Lowry, of Ft. Wayne, has purchased an interest in the Auburn COURIER. We welcome Mr. Lowry to the quill tribe. The COURIER is one of the best papers in Indiana.

[Garrett Herald.]

We met Mr. Robert Lowry, who has lately associated himself with Mr. Reed in the publication of the Auburn COURIER, this week, and were glad to form his acquaintance and welcome him to the editorial fraternity of DeKalb county.

[Bentonville (Ark.) Advance.]

R. J. Lowry, who for more than a year was connected with this office, is now one of the editors of the Auburn (Ind.) COURIER, a neat forty-eight column paper. Bob can get up as good a local as anybody of his size and age.

[Kendallville Standard.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Lowry of Ft. Wayne, has purchased an interest in the Auburn COURIER and assumed the duties as one of the editors of that paper. We extend a cordial greeting to Mr Lowry, and welcome him as a member of the press gang.

[Albion New Era.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Robert Lowry, has become one of the editors of the Auburn COURIER. The judge is an ex-journalist with whom we at one time made an engagement to learn the "art preservative," but was prevailed upon to attend school instead.

[Columbia City Post.]

We note by last week's issue of the Auburn COURIER that Mr. Reed has associated with him in the editorial and business management of that paper Mr. Robert J. Lowry. "Rob." is a son of Judge Lowry, of Ft. Wayne, and a young man of much promise in the newspaper guild. Success to the COURIER under its new management.

[Decatur Union.]

Robert J. Lowry, son of Judge Lowry, of Ft. Wayne, has lately associated himself with the Auburn COURIER. Messrs. Lowry & Reed will, undoubtedly, make the COURIER a weighty missile in the campaign of 1880. We have no reason to believe, however, that it will be fair and just in its work, and not given entirely to party abuse. The Union wishes the COURIER an abundance of success.

Sabbath-School Institute.

The Richland township S. S. teacher's institute will hold their third quarterly meeting on Saturday, April 26, 1879, at the U. B. church, one-half mile south of Sedan. Following is the

PROGRAMME:

1. Parental attendance—how to gain and maintain, by Rev. Snyder, of Waterloo. 2. Model class, taught by Rev. L. Harding. 3. Lesson-leaves—benefits derived therefrom, by Mrs. M. Chaffee, of Corunna. 4. What great gulf divides the Sunday-school from the church? by Rev. A. W. Burns of Butler. 5. Quarterly institutes and children's meetings—benefits to the Sunday-school, by Rev. L. Rice, of Auburn. 6. Question drawer. All Sunday-school workers are most urgently requested to attend.

COMMITTEE.

The Grant Movement has Reached Auburn.

A few weeks since announcements were made through the newspapers of this place that steps were being taken for the organization of a soldiers' association. We were not advised as to who the leaders of the movement were, but a list of the temporary officers as published in the republican papers, showed only the names of republicans, which induced us to believe that the movement was purely political; still, we did not express an opinion through the COURIER, fearing that we might possibly be mistaken, and as our sympathies are with the good and true men who risked their lives to preserve the Union, the writer was inclined to regard with favor an organization as a band of brothers, NOT SOLDIERS, (for we are all citizens now), who could meet at stated times and recount the many happy scenes enjoyed, and the many hardships and privations endured as comrades and defenders of our country—be to one another friends and helpers, and keep alive that kindly and cordial feeling which was characteristic of the army. The meetings of such an organization would cause renewed hope for the continuance of peace and liberty in a glorious country, and for the prosperity and happiness for ourselves, our families and our posterity. Such, however, are not the objects of the association now about to be organized in Auburn. Our informant says that on last Saturday evening a meeting was held for the purpose of adopting a constitution and by-laws, the same having been prepared by a committee and presented for adoption, with a preamble setting forth that the soldier is indebted to the republican party for everything he has received from 1861 until the present time; that the republican party is the only hope of the country, &c., &c. The preamble as submitted by the committee was the subject of considerable discussion by the republican members. Mr. McIntosh being the leader in defending the preamble, who made use of the most vile and insulting language, of which the following are only a few of the unreasonable insinuations and infamous falsehoods uttered by him; viz: That the democratic party is too liberal in pensioning soldiers. That the soldiers of the south will soon receive the same pensions as those of the north. That the confederate bonds will be paid. That the time is coming when the soldiers will be expected to do something, and they must be prepared to act. That the soldiers of the north fought to free the slaves. Tha. Gen's. McClellan and Porter were traitors to their county. That the people of the south trail the stars and stripes in the dust, and despise the northern soldier. Mr. McIntosh insisted that the association should be organized in the interest of the republican party, otherwise he would have nothing to do with it. In other words, he cares nothing about the soldiers, unless they can be made to subserve the interests of the most corrupt party that ever disgraced any country. Other republican members of the association were not so frank as to admit that the object of the association was to aid their party politically, and preferred to have the preamble amended, asserting in their arguments that they could accomplish more for the party by leaving the preamble and constitution in such a shape that it would not disclose the object of the organization. Mr. Weamer was particularly anxious to have it understood that he was a thoroughbred radical; he said he would rather be shot at by every person in the room, than have it said that he had any sympathy for the rebels in congress, and, that if he thought there was a drop of democratic blood in his veins he would let it out; he thought it would be policy to say nothing about politics in the preamble. The chairman of the meeting (Mr. Culbertson) undertook to explain, and in so doing "let the cat out of the bag," when he said, "It seems that the preamble and articles of the constitution were formed by the republican party," (cries of no! no! from the committee). If Mr. Culbertson had said that the forms were furnished by Grant's campaign committee, he would have hit the mark exactly. If soldiers of the late war who now belong to the republican party deem it necessary to form an organization for the benefit of Grant or any other republican, it is their privilege to do so, but we advise democrats who were soldiers to have nothing to do with any such an organization. We can see no cause for exciting war prejudices; the clash of arms has been hushed by the angel of peace; battle flags are laid away; we have one government and one country; time is healing the wounds of the nation, caused by a civil war. So let it be. The boys in blue fought a good fight—built their monuments more enduring that the pyramids, and thousands of them lay down in death. Earth's flora decorates their graves; the winds, in their tenderness, make harps of leaf and spray, and chant an everlasting requiem above their inanimate dust. The survivors are honored; those maimed are pensioned; and generous impulses, kind words, fraternity, unity, peace and good will should prevail.

The Columbia City Post, of last week, gives the Indianian the following well merited bit: "It may be that it is none of our business, but we nevertheless suggest that the Indianian can find room for at least a column more of "interesting matter" each week if it will just crowd out those "compliments" of itself. Self praise can be over done."

—Spring suits are numerous. We saw one spring out of a saloon door rather suddenly yesterday.

—By May 31st J. E. Beugnot wants his accounts straight. Go in and square up without further notice.

—At the Methodist conference being held at Goshen, Rev. Norris was appointed minister at this place.

—The days are near at hand when you can tear the lining out of your old clothes for a summer costume.

—An organization has been formed in Ft. Wayne which wears the title of "Klu Klux Klah." Pretty name.

—The much-abused onion now decorates the festal board and diffuses its fragrance on the dining-room air.

—Parties knowing themselves indebted to J. E. Beugnot, will please come up and settle before the last of May.

—Miss Sturtevant, of Jackson, came down last Saturday to see her brother, who is operator at the junction depot.

—Craft & Co. sell the best two-buckle plow shoe in DeKalb county for $1.00, and all goods equally low. Strictly one price.

—A New Orleans woman has married a Mr. Beer, and is intoxicated over her happiness.—Ex. Two more Beers this way, please.

—Base ball is gradually breaking out in epidemic form, and the boys say that Auburn is going to have the boss nine of the county.

—Four tin pails and one dipper for one dollar, at Kiblinger & Co's.

—Wood is painfully scarce. We ran out of it a day or two ago, and came near having to shut up shop for the remainder of the week.

—C. Eckart is now prepared to supply his customers with first-class carriages and buggies. He has all the different styles constantly on hand.

—The largest sale of tickets ever made in one day at the Ft. W., J. & S. ticket-office, was that of last Monday, the receipts being $172.60.

—M. Houston is prepared to deliver ice to business houses or private residences at any time. Call at his meat market and leave your order.

—Rev. J. E. Erwin will make Bluffton the scene of his ministerial duties hereafter, having been thus appointed by the late Methodist conference.

—What's the matter with our spring poetry manufacturers? Not a single effusion has yet been tendered, and we are waiting in untold anxiety.

—Ed. Morris, the promising young M. D., of Ft. Wayne, gave Auburn an abbreviated visit a few days since, on his return from a trip to Hicksville.

—A. O. Miller, well known through this region as a first-class theatre man, will be here April 23rd. The play will be "Over the Hills to the Poor-house."

—Owing to the closeness of times the town trustees have extended the time of paying town tax fifteen days from this date, April 8, 1879.

T. P. SCOTT, Town Marshall.

—The best way to remove paint from the wall is to put the sleeve of your best coat against it and rub; we've tried it, and know whereof we speak.

—Don't forget that A. O. Miller and troupe will be here next Wednesday evening, April 23, at Ensley's hall, in the play of "Over the Hills to the Poorhouse."

—The fellow who is furnishing two dollars for a five-dollar note, signed by one of our citizens when he is drunk, should call a halt. It's a quiet way of stealing.

—Postmaster Rainier commenced the sale of ten-dollar four per cent. bonds of the government only a week ago, and has already disposed of fifty-two, or $520 worth.

—Mr. Geo. Clark will be at the livery stable of W. B. Adams, in Corunna, on Monday and Tuesday of each week, where his horses can be examined by the farmers of that community.

—The passenger train going north on the Jackson road, due here at six in the morning, was three hours late on Tuesday, owing to a switch-engine having jumped the track at Ft. Wayne.

—Joe Beugnot will soon leave for the west, and has placed his saloon in the hands of William Grescup, who will dish up things in his absence. He expects to be gone about a year.

—The drama to be presented next Wednesday evening, at Ensley's hall,—"Over the Hills to the Poorhouse"—is highly spoken of by the press wherever it has appeared. Don't fail to see it.

—The mite society connected with the M. E. church will be entertained by Mrs. M. B. Willis, at her residence, on next Wednesday evening. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

MRS. A. ROBBINS, Sec'y.

—You must not forget to remember that the "light fantastic" holds forth again to-night at Ensley's hall. It only costs seventy-five cents, too, and every brother is expected to be there with his sister—or some other fellow's sister.

—The hotel men are talking of running a free 'bus to and from the trains, and we think it a good scheme. Many of their customers would like it better, but we always prefer walking; makes our feet sore to ride.

—Persons who are inclined that way had a number-one opportunity to swear at the weather Tuesday morning; but before the sun's rays fell perpendicularly, all signs of snow had vanished and everything was lovely.

—The small boy now forgets, in his youthful absent-mindedness, that school is in session and hies himself away to the brooklet, having first got entangled, in some unaccountable way, with his little fishing apparatus.

—Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, will deliver his celebrated lecture entitled "Does Death End All?" at the academy of music, Ft. Wayne, Ind., Thursday evening, April 24. General admission, 50 cents; reserved seats, 75c.

—Our enterprising manufacturer, Mr. James Anderson, is again in the market with a lot of first class carriages and buggies of his own manufacture, which he will sell at low figures, and on one year's time with approved security. He defies any shop in Northern Indiana to furnish better material than is used in his work. 9-9w

—There is a young lady in our little city—and she's not very large, either,—who can hold a 25-pound keg of lead in each hand, at arm's length, with perfect ease. She is entitled to the cake, and the young men may just take a back seat or get out their dumb-bells for practice.

—A man's curiosity never reaches the female standard until somebody tells him his name was in yesterday's paper. —New York Star. Yes it does; you tell a man his wife was seen at the theatre with a handsome stranger, and see if his curiosity doesn't "reach the female standard."

—A large yellow dog—a pretty dog—passed up the street last night with an oyster-can—a very ugly can—hitched on behind. He was evidently in a hurry about something, as he was making about 75 knots per hour. Now who could have been mean enough to make such a combination?

—Below will be found a complete list of the Petit Juror's drawn for the ensuing May term:

James McClellan, Aaron D. Moore, John Buchanan, David McCurdy, E. F. Metcalf, Sylvester Kutzner, Wm Henderson, Jeremiah Boyer, B. F. Osborn, Peter H. Gramling, C. C. Shaffer, S. Haverstock.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. COST OF INSTRUCTION PER CAPITA OF ENROLLMENT.

It has been seen that the cost of the schools for the year was $3,747.54; crediting the schools with the foreign tuition, and deducting that sum ($175) from the cost, the actual cost to the town is seen to have been $3,572.54. Dividing this amount by 439, the average cost of instruction per capita of enrollment is found to have been $8.14.

In last year's report this item was $10.71. It is apparent, therefore, that there has been a reduction this year of almost one-fourth. There are those to whom this reduction will signify "economy." It will have that signification, however, only to those whose idea of economy embraces no other consideration than that of dollars and cents. To those who can see how this measure has affected the schools it will have a very different signification. A system of graded schools, properly organized and efficiently managed costs more money than $8.14 per capita of enrollment, if the length of the school year is more than five months.

Fort Wayne has an excellent system of public schools, but there, according to the last published report, we have seen the cost of the schools per capita of enrollment is $14.50; in St. Louis it is $23; in Lafayette, Ind., $15.52, and in Terre Haute, Ind., $21.30. In Auburn, then, the cost of public instruction is about half that in other places that have old, well-established and efficient school systems.

Now, it is possible to have schools in Auburn at even a less cost than $8.14 per capita; but I submit it as a proposition which I do not doubt time will verify, that the schools here, as a system, will remain at a low standard of excellence until the amount of money expended on them is increased one-half.

We have shown that the cost of the schools this year was about one-fourth less than last year. The reduction was brought about by closing the ward building, and by reducing the number of teachers from eight to six. This change rendered some of the schools too large to be conveniently handled, and so rendered the work in some measure less effective than it otherwise would have been. But the school most affected by the change was the high school. Owing to the removal of the assistant teacher, work in that department has this year proceeded under great disadvantages. To adapt the number of recitations to the insufficient teaching force, several of the most advanced classes in Latin and mathematics had to be discontinued, thus effectually crushing a plan I had formed three years ago of graduating a class at the end of this year. But another change was necessary, to get through with the classes that remained, it was necessary to reduce the regular time of recitation from forty-five minutes to thirty, (a reduction in time of just one-third), and to reduce the number of studies of a majority of the pupils from four to three. The pernicious effects of these several changes are apparent, and are to me cause of deep regret. The class that should have graduated is broken. The year's work is not nearly finished, nor has it been prosecuted with that degree of thoroughness which good school work demands.

That any one in particular is chargeable with this state of things, I shall not say. The remedy lies in putting more money into the treasury, and an assistant teacher into the high school.

PROMOTIONS.

The work as laid out for the several grades of your schools, supposes the length of the school year to be nine months. The length of the last school year, however, having been but seven months, the work of the year was not finished. In consequence of this, there were no final grade examinations and no promotions. I recommend, therefore, that the first six weeks of the next school year be devoted to the finishing of the work in the several grades, that final examinations be then had and promotions made.

I cannot conclude my report without acknowledging my indebtedness to my associate teachers, through whose zeal and untiring energy the work of the year was brought to a more successful issue than I had anticipated.

To the people of Auburn in general, and to my own pupils in particular, I must own the deep reluctance with which I entertain the thought that my work here is ended. I shall take my departure, however, with the pleasant assurance that it has not been altogether in vain, but that I have contributed something, however little, to promote the general excellence of the public schools of Auburn.

Respectfully submitted by
M. SEILER, Supt.

Delicate and Delicious.

The Pet Rose, Alista Bouquet, Ylang-Ylang, Musk Rose, and all of the odors made for the handkerchief and toilet by Dr. Price, are not only very delicate and delicious, but fragrant and persistent. Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes are certainly as sweet as the flowers from which they are made.

G. S. McCord will canvass the county this spring and summer with his patent feather renovator on wheels. This machine has won a reputation in Auburn, and vicinity, that recommends it to the public. This process of steaming and cleaning feathers only needs a trial; it recommends itself, will remove all filth and increase the size of a bed from one-third to one-half and give the feathers the life and appearance of new ones; no damage to the feathers whatever. Price still lower than ever. Don't be humbugged; don't let your beds go from your house; if we don't suit you, we don't take your money.

STAR CLOTHING HOUSE.

New Departments. An Immense Stock of Goods.

The very large and justly popular ready made clothing, hat and cap, and furnishing establishment, known as the

STAR CLOTHING HOUSE,

under the proprietorship and management of Samuel F. and Max Nirdlinger and Peter Morganthaler, "Sam, Pete & Max," Nos. 33 Calhoun and 5 East Main streets, opens the season with immense invoices of goods in all its departments. The store fronts on Calhoun and Main streets, and has been enlarged so that three stories are now occupied with the immense business of the firm. Their stock of goods is much larger this spring than at any time heretofore, and the quality of the goods much better, and the prices lower. Among the new features of the house is the where measures are taken and suits made to order, in style, and at prices that will surprise anyone. In nobby business suits of the very best material and of fashionable make, Sam, Pete & Max are taking the lead.

A prominent state official, who is a close observer, and who visits all parts of the state, says: "Messrs. Sam, Pete & Max carry the largest and finest stock in the state." Strangers from all sections are daily visiting the house, and expressing the highest compliments and praises at the great display of at the Star. In the finishing department, there never were more complete and satisfactory selections.

In short, the Star Clothing House stands at the front of similar establishments in the state, and no one who visits it will fail to be satisfied with the style, quality and price of goods. They can supply the demand for goods in any of its departments, and guarantee entire satisfaction in every particular. Under the supervision of the gentlemanly Peter Morganthaler, and financial management of the genial Max Nirdlinger, we are not surprised that the house is increasing in popularity, and extending its business. The Star can be recommended in every particular, for the continued patronage of the public, of which it already has a much larger share than any other establishment of the sort in northern Indiana. See advertisement in another place.

—W. H. Kiblinger & Co. have just received 2000 lbs. of Eckstine, Hill & Co's. white lead. 2000 lbs. of Saydam, Lawrence and company's white lead. 2000 lbs. 'Stunning' Styles.

Stra1gers visiting Ft. Wayne this spring should by all means not neglect to visit A. S. Lauferty & Co's., better known as the C. O. D. Clothiers, and universally acknowledged as the one price, square dealers, unsurpassable nobby clothiers, and dealers in the best made garments for the least money. Their large and Commodious Establishment (presided over by Lauferty himself, assisted by a host of as gentlemanly and pleasant assistants as one can wish to meet,) is situated at No. 9 East Main St., exactly opposite the north door of the court house. You can find there the most complete, well made assortment of clothing for old men, for middle-aged men, for young men, for boys for children, in fact, for the entire male sex, of any size, shape or descsiption, at prices within the reach of all. Beyond doubt, it is the place where one feels at home the moment he enters, and never leaves UNSUITED or DISSATISFIED. Their line of furnishing goods, hats, caps, trunks and valises is in itself simply an immense department, Remember the place,

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on

MASKED BATTERIES.

If you'll keep it secret, honor bright,
  I'll tell you a little story, Jo—
Something that happened to me last night,
  Here at the masquerade ball, you know.

You may have noticed I've spooned of late
  On Laura Clyde—nothing else to do;
She's rather pretty—at any rate,
  Fond of flirting, and I am, too.

Laura's a friend of my sister Fan;
  Her room joins mine, and the walls are thin—
So I, by accident, heard them plan
  Their dresses for masquerading in.

The ball was lovely, the costumes fine
  And, either dancing or iced champagne—
Can't say which, but suspect the wine—
  Just a little confused my brain.

So, meeting Laura—gypsy maid—
  Knew her at once by her dress, you see—
I took her out for a promenade
  On the piazza alone with me.

"Flirted?" Said I was deep in love—
  Madly worshiped the ground she trod—
Vowed it by all below, above.
  Did she she return it? A word, a nod?

The fair head drooped in assent; and I
  Snatched off the mask—with rapture kissed her;
A peal of laughter was my reply—
  By Jove, old boy, it was my sister!

Laugh at me, Joe! Don't spare my pride
  Nor mind my feelings! I feel so glad
It was my sister, not Laura Clyde.
  Heavens! what an escape I had!

WHAT HERBERT SAID.

"Don't go, Ellie; please don't! What will Herbert say?"

"I don't care in the least what Herbert says. He has no right to dictate to me. Not that he ever does," Ellie added, quickly. "Mr. Granville Ferguson has invited me to go to the park with him, and there are four other ladies and their escorts to join us there. I am going, and I shall wear my new cashmere. It is just the right length for skating. If you were good-natured, now, you would lend me the seal-skin cap Uncle Will last gave you."

"You can have the cap, Ellie, but I do feel bad about Herbert. You know he loves you."

"He has never told me he loves me."

"Never told you he loves you!" said Carrie. "Don't he come here every afternoon or evening to see you?"

"How do you know he don't come to see Aunt Fanny, or you?"

"Ellie!"

There was such keen pain in Carrie's tone that pretty Ellie sprang from her seat and remorsefully threw her arms around her sister, kissing her warmly and saying, "If every body knew you as well as I do, Carrie, how good and sweet you are, never cross or out of temper like me, and knowing twenty things where I have learned one, you would have fifty lovers. Men are such idiots. If a girl has a pretty face, that is all they ask."

Certainly, if this speech was true, Ellie Wilson had no cause to complain of nature's unkindness. She was very pretty, with a saucy, sunny face, full of sparkle and animation, and a dainty little figure, every movement of which was graceful.

But Carrie, only two years older than her sister, and not 22, without any great beauty naturally, had, through the carelessness of a nurse in her infancy, been the victim of a fall, which had cut open one cheek, leaving a long, red scar, disfiguring her for life. Her soft blue eyes, her glossy brown hair, her clear complexion, were all lost sight of in the long, blood-red mark that covered one side of her face from temple to chin. It grew purple in the cold air, crimson in summer heat, but it never faded away.

It had been poor Carrie's cross from childhood. Her school life had been embittered by the taunts of her companions, and she had shut herself up in a great measure from society, from her sensitive shrinking from notice. It was not, perhaps, strange that Ellie, praised and petted all her life for her beauty, should also have given undue weight to her sister's misfortune. That Carrie would be an old maid and Ellie make a brilliant match was a certainty in the minds of the family and friends.

But relatives and friends alike were pleased when Herbert Brandon, after the death of Mr. Wilson, became a constant visitor at the house of the orphan girls. He had been their father's clerk and later his junior partner, and still carried on with one other surviving partner the business of Wilson & Co., though the head of the house had been three years dead at the time my story opens. Business at first, and afterward certainly his own good pleasure, brought him often to see the young ladies and their aunt, who had filled their dead mother's place for many long years. He was a man whose love would honor any woman, and Carrie was not alone in supposing that pretty Ellie was the chosen of his heart.

Carrie liked to think so. Of all the suitors that came to visit her pretty sister, Herbert was certainly the one she would select for a brother. Never having thought it possible that she could win a closer love than a brother's, Carrie was naturally very anxious about Ellie's choice, and she shrank with positive pain whenever she thought that Granville Ferguson was usurping Herbert's place. He was a far handsomer man, wore finer dress, had diamonds sparkling upon his shirt-front and little finger, lived in handsome chambers, and was the pink of courtesy. And yet Carrie did not like him.

On the day when Ellie so wilfully persisted in accepting Granville Ferguson's escort to the Park, Herbert was coming to spend the evening, to try some duets. But Ellie said Herbert and the duets could be had at any time, while skating was a luxury to be seized whenever the opportunity occurred.

So, when Granville Ferguson, in his jaunty overcoat, with a tiny bouquet in the button-hole, made his appearance just before sunset, he found Ellie with the new brown cashmere and sealskin hat waiting for him. She had put the crispest of ruffles into a ruff lined with blue silk and the bewildering blue bow under her pretty chin, and her hair was in the puffiest of golden curls under the rim of the cap. When the ornamental water, brilliantly illuminated by the moon, was reached, Ellie's feet could scarcely keep still to have the skates fastened.

They were well matched upon the ice, for there were few of her own sex as graceful and expert upon skates as pretty Ellie Wilson. In her eager excitement she overlooked, entirely forgot, the fact that the party her escort had promised to meet did not appear, and she glided among the groups gathered around her, nodding now and again to friend or acquaintance, sparkling and happy.

She was becoming tired, and turned to suggest to her companion a few moments' rest on the bank, when she saw him accosted by two men, who, without skates, were standing upon the ice near him. They were not near enough for her to hear the conversation, as she had darted off a few minutes before for a long sweep on the glassy surface of the lake, supposing Granville Ferguson followed beside her.

It made her uneasy to see him walking away with his new companions, leaving her alone in the crowd around her. She knew that it was getting late, and already the concourse of people was thinning rapidly. There was a long walk to be taken, and she was growing conscious of curious looks directed toward her. Granville Ferguson was no longer to be seen, and her loneliness was becoming almost unbearable, when her friend Mrs. Morrison, with her husband, skated to her side.

"Don't faint, Ellie," her friend began; "we will take care of you. You must come to our house to-night."

"What has happened?"

"Granville Ferguson has been arrested."

"Arrested!" cried poor Ellie, with white lips, for the handsome scamp had won more than a passing interest in her impulsive heart. "For what?"

"Passing a forged bill. He is one of a Western gang the police are seeking. Come, you must go home with us, and we will send you home early in the morning."

"But Carrie!"

"She will be frightened, no doubt, but it will be for a few hours only."

And Mr. Morrison, seeing the gathering pallor of the pretty face, hastily sought a cab, put Ellie into it, his wife following.

In the meantime Carrie, in the quiet dress she always wore, thinking regretfully that finery of any kind would only make more conspicuous the disfiguring scar upon her face, waited for Herbert. She could not help a little thrill of pleasure at the thought of a quiet evening with him alone, for her aunt generally nodded in silence over her knitting. She had faithfully tried to keep Ellie at home; that having failed, she could enjoy the evening. Ellie was very exacting of her lover's attentions, if lover he was, keeping him beside her constantly; while Carrie, as was habitual with her, kept in the background, listening to her sister's lively chat, and wondering why she could never jest and frolic with Herbert.

The little mantel clock was striking 8 when he came. Aunt Fanny, who had been all day shopping in the keen winter air, had yielded to the drowsy influence of the warm room, and was quietly asleep in her arm-chair; but Carrie was awake, and went forward to meet the visitor.

"I am very sorry Ellie is out," she said; "but I'll try the duets with you, if you wish."

A look of pleasure flashed into Herbert's face, but shy Carrie, looking down, missed it.

"But you usually have Ellie."

"Ellie does not sing as well as you do. Her voice is not as good, and she is careless. But, before we try the duets, sit here a little while and talk to me. I so seldom see you alone."

She sat down, wondering a little at the request, but the wonder grew deeper as Herbert talked to her. Little by little the truth came home to her that Herbert Brandon was glad, not sorry, to find Ellie gone, that the words her sister had spoken in jest, supposing them far from any truth, were indeed a fact, and that it was her own plain face, not Ellie's pretty one, Herbert came to see. In words whose earnest truth could not be doubted Herbert told her how her gentle sweetness, her useful, cheerful life had won his love, and that his hope of happiness for life rested upon her answer to the simple, unmistakable question that came at last:

"Will you be my wife, Carrie? Can you give to my keeping the happiness of your life, believing I will earnestly endeavor to guard you from every sorrow? I know I am not worthy—no man can be worthy—of such a treasure as I ask, but I love you, darling, I love you."

He knew his love was returned when the shy but happy eyes were raised to his own. Yet involuntarily one little white hand was raised to cover the disfiguring scar. Tenderly Herbert prisoned it, and pressed his own lips upon the cheek.

"Let me help you to forget that," he whispered.

They talked long and earnestly, each learning much unguessed before of the other's heart-confidence, till the clock chimed 11.

"It is time Ellie was home!" Carrie cried, starting at the sound.

"Where has she gone?"

"To Hyde Park with Granville Ferguson."

Herbert started as if he had been shot.

"Granville Ferguson? Carrie, I must go out. I can get a cab. But it is too late. Some of her friends will surely be there."

"Why, what is the matter?" asked Carrie, frightened at his evident agitation.

"I meant to tell you this evening, but I forgot everything else when I found you alone, Carrie. Granville Ferguson is one of a gang of forgers. Hill Lyman is a very intimate friend of one of the detectives, and this afternoon he told me they had secured the proofs against him for which they had been waiting for months. He has in his possession this evening a large sum derived from forgery, and he was doubtless arrested at the park. Hill told me the whole plan, and invited me to go out and 'see the fun,' as he expressed it; but, seeing no fun in the downfall of a man we have all met as a friend more or less, I declined. If I had only asked sooner for Ellie I might have gone to the park. Did she expect to meet other friends?"

"She spoke of some ladies Mr. Ferguson was to meet," said Carrie, who was really crying at the thought of her sister's position, "but I do not know who they were. She always does meet friends at the park, but I could not tell where to look for her. Oh, Herbert, it is dreadful! What can we do?"

"I will go out on the chance of finding her."

But when he reached the park the lake was deserted. It was useless to seek for Ellie at that hour among her large circle of friends, and Herbert could only return to Carrie with his tidings.

Aunt Fanny was awake and thoroughly terrified by that time. She enjoyed a sensation, and seldom had so fine an opportunity for hysterics, and so fell into them on the spot.

It was a dreary night for Carrie after Herbert left, for she could not listen to her aunt's dismal forebodings without some answering fear in her own heart. But quite early all terror was dissipated by Ellie's appearance.

"I came as early as they would let me," she said, after telling the event of the evening; "but I have not closed my eyes all night. I knew you would be uneasy about me."

She looked pale and wan, and Carrie saw that there was a deeper sorrow than she confessed in her warm heart. She bustled about, insisted upon putting her to bed to rest, brought her up a cup of coffee and petted her in a loving, tender fashion, that Ellie could not resist. For, after a short struggle with herself, she whispered: "I am ashamed of it, Carrie, now; but I did like him, so much that when asked me this afternoon to marry him I only put him off for a few days, meaning to say yes then. I did not quite like to engage myself till I had told you and Aunt Fan. Carrie, was Herbert here?"

"Yes, dear. He went to the park for you; but you were gone."

"He is always kind," sighed poor Ellie. "I don't love Herbert, Carrie, but I think he's the best friend we have. Carrie!"—for Carrie's face certainly told secrets in spite of her efforts to keep down the blushes—"Carrie, look at me! I will see!" and she lifted the shy, drooping face. "Is he to be my brother?"

"Yes, dear; he has applied for the situation."

"You absurd little thing! There, don't try to explain anything. I'll be your bridesmaid; and mind, Carrie, it is an immense relief to my mind to think I can flirt as much as I please and go where I like without your piteous 'What will Herbert say?' for it appears to me he has 'said his say,' as the old women express it, to some purpose."

And, after all, the red scar was hidden by a bridal veil, and Herbert Brandon sees no face so fair in his eyes as the disfigured one of his gentle, loving wife.

Why Dick Catlin Bathes No More.

It was Sabbath in the little town of Frisco, and a holy quiet settled down as though a mist from heaven, with the sunlight o'er the Wasatch mountains, wrapped all in peace. It was Sabbath, and out from the little town came the stage—the stage that has rocked and swung and rolled along from the white, billowy beach of the Atlantic, across the prairie farms of the West, up, over and beyond the towering Rockies, and bathed its alkali-stained boot in the placid waves of the Pacific ocean. Dick Catlin drove that stage, and a better driver never whaled the flank of a broncho. The day was warm as up the Beaver river rolled he, and his voice, clear as a trumpet, made the carbonate-stained hills of Lincoln ring again and again as he sung:

Up and down this world I've roamed,
  And to many camps I've been;
The winds of many lands have combed
  Those shaggy locks, I ween.
I've (get up there, Rowdy!) been to old Montana,
  Likewise to Idaho,
But to Frisco give the banner,
  Where the big bonanzas grow.

  God's blessing on Montana,
    God bless old Idaho;
  But, hurrah! hurrah! for Frisco,
    Where the big bonanzas grow.

The warm sun thawed the old man's heart, and the memory of old times stole into his soul, bringing back again the days gone by, the swimming, apple-stealing, dog-fighting days when he was a boy and Ben Holladay nowhere. Rounding a point in the river, the shade fell across a nook. Dick pulled up, and, as he had no passengers, concluded to take a swim. He knew his team and they knew him. They had been together for years, and, as Dick dropped the lines, he said to himself: "There is nothin' like knowin' stock that's posted. Stay still now, boys" (this to the horses), "and the old man'll have a good wash." Undressing and piling his clothes on the seat, Dick left the stage and plunged into the cool waters. But the stock "was posted." No sooner had Dick plunged in than they plunged out, and, when he crawled out on the bank, a streak of dust away off through the sage brush was all that the poor fellow could see. Now came the tug of war. The team kept the road, and Dick knew that, by cutting across the country and running (as he afterward said) like blazes, he could head them off. There was no one there to witness the race. Perhaps at times a mischievous angel would peep through his tiny fingers and laugh at that big, burly, stark-naked man outrunning the jack-rabbits in the valley of the Beaver. When he overtook the stage and got the team under control, he didn't say much, but, throwing the lap-robe in front of him till a wagon-load of women passed by, he scraped the blood and the cactus and sage and greasewood from his limbs, and swore that, if the good Lord would forgive him, he would never wash any more. And to this day Dick has kept his promise.—Salt Lake Tribune.

The railroad on the ice across the Missouri river at Bismarck has floated away. During the last days of its use it was from one to three feet under water, and big chunks of ice were sweeping over it, but trains of freight cars, bearing materials for the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad, were hurried over up to the last possible moment. The last locomotive to cross was careened by the moving and sinking of the ice, and the fire was extinguished by the water.

SINGULAR DISASTER.

Drowning of a Body of British Cavalry in an Afghan Torrent.

[London Cor. Chicago Times.]

A strange disaster has befallen English troops in Afghanistan. Gen. Browne's division and the Eleventh Bengal Lancers had crossed the Cabul river, a squadron of the Tenth Hussars following. Owing partly to the darkness, and also to a mistake, the leading troopers struck the river below the fordable point where the Lancers crossed, and encountered in full force an overpowering torrent. Within a few minutes the entire squadron were struggling in the rushing river. Horsemen who had fought their way through thousands of hostile tribes succumbed to the rapids. A few stout swimmers, who had learned the Indian art of slipping off their horses and holding on by the tail or saddle, were saved. The others were swamped by their accoutrements. If it had been known to be a difficult crossing, the troops would have been prepared, and could have made it with ease. No danger was expected.

The unfortunate Hussars became an easy prey to the waters. Many were instantly swept out of sight, being weighed down with their trappings, while others perished in trying to land on the steep shore on the other side. Fifty men and the same number of horses, and one officer, are missing at the rendezvous. All, no doubt, were drowned. The next day twenty bodies were recovered.

Afghanistan's mountain rivers and valleys are full of dreadful memories to the English. Near the very spot from which this disaster is reported occurred the awful massacre of the British in the last war, in which only one escaped—Dr. Brydon. Thompson's picture of this bloody deed, for the next Academy, is just finished. It represents the troops sinking exhausted in view of Jellalabad, on the banks of the back-water of the Cabul river. This fresh calamity will give the picture a new and sad interest. People in London who are familiar with the country say that in the spring months the back-water of the Cabul river is a lake almost in itself.

The Tenth Hussars is one of the crack regiments of the army, composed of picked men and commanded by some of the best officers in the service. Its headquarters in England are at Canterbury. Its honorary Colonel is the Prince of Wales. Its Lieutenant Colonel is Lord Ralph Kerr, and a majority of its officers are members of aristocratic families.

Fashion Fripperies.

No toilet is complete without a jabot of some kind.

Shirred lining for bonnet brims take precedence of all others.

Black toilets and black lace bonnets are the furor of the moment in Paris.

The latest novelties in shoes are the Henri Trois sabots and the Catherine de Medici souliers.

Parisian coiffures are de rigeuer low on the back of the head, or rather on the nape of the neck.

Delicate lace-clocked stockings should always be worn over another pair of tinted silk or Lisle thread.

Novelties in shoes have Louis Quinze heels, and many straps across the instep, with bows and buckles.

Gypsy bonnets have large flowing brims raised in front, tied down at the sides, and falling on the neck, after being partially raised in the back.

Satteens and mummy-cloth novelties show dainty little flower and leaf bouquet and vine patterns in jardiniere colors on pure white grounds.

The favorite flowers for tacking on bonnet crowns are asters, marguerites, pansies and eglantine blooms, with the yellow anthers showing plainly on the delicate pink ground of the petals.

A gay morning robe always looks vulgar at a watering place or hotel breakfast, and corduroy velvet as well as satin is seen in combination with camel's hair. French bonnets and other light wool fabrics in spring costumes.

Dressy parasols for the country or seashore are of ecru pongees, with spots, rings, or diamond patterns of brown, red, or blue, or they are of plain ecru pongees, with bandans or Scotch plaid linings, or gay-colored linings with white polka dots.

How Sugar Barrels Are Made.

An interviewer hailing from the Jersey City Journal, of inquiring mind, paid a flying visit to the top floor of Neil O'Donnell's cooperage, and was shown some of the mysteries connected with the manufacture of sugar barrels. In the first stage, the Irishman's recipe for making a cannon will do for a sugar barrel, slightly altered: First, make a hole and put your staves around it. The operative does this by holding a stout wooden hoop in one hand, and placing the staves in position with the other—very quickly, too, as the work is done by the piece. The embryo barrel is next caught in the bight of a stout rope, made fast on one end to a cleat, and the other running over an iron pulley and attached to a treadle. By pressing the treadle with the weight of the operative, the line is drawn taut, and the strong purchase thus effected compresses the staves to the requisite degree of tightness. The barrel is now placed in a huge fire-place which resembles a blast furnace, and is baked for a few minutes, when it is removed, the tops and bottoms are planed, the inside edges beveled for the "heads," which are quickly "put on," a few finishing touches given to the hoops and the barrel is made. A good workman can make forty barrels a day, and in brisk seasons about 6,000 receptacles for that saccharine substance composed of bone-dust, sand and sugar are turned out. The staves are shipped to the cooperage from Michigan, where they are made into the required shape from elm logs by a machine.—Jersey City Journal.

A Desperado Caught.

Ayres Jones, a noted Georgia desperado, is at last caught. For a year he defied all officers, and lived in a mountain pass in the North of Georgia, deemed impregnable. Two years ago, at the head of a band of moonshiners he attacked troops and killed Lieut. Mc' Intyre, and, till brought to the railroad by his captors, never saw a locomotive.

Sheep in Colorado.

A Colorado correspondent of the Troy Times gives some timely information on a subject on which there is a good deal of interest in the trade just now. The most reliable information obtained, he says, gives the number of sheep in the State as about 2,000,000, valued at $2.25 per head, or $4,500,000 in total value. Last year's clip of wool was about 5,000,000 pounds, estimated at 17½ cents per pound, $875,000. There should be added to this 500,000 lambs, valued at $1.50 per head, $750,000. During 1878 30,000 head were driven in from California, and 15,000 from New Mexico. The shipments of wool the coming season will be about 7,000,000 pounds, which at last year's price will amount to $1,225,000, to which may be added the value of 750,000 lambs at $1.50 per head, $1,125,000, making $2,350,000 income from sheep alone. Owing to the long distance and the want of double-decked cars, the railroad freight on sheep to Eastern markets is so high that it will not pay to ship mutton to any great extent.

Thus far the business of sheep-raising in Colorado has been very profitable. A flock of 1,800 ewes, costing $4,500, were placed on a ranch in Southern Colorado. In eight years 1,600 sheep were killed for mutton and consumed on the ranch, and 7,740 were sold for $29,680. There are 14,800 head on hand, worth, at $3 per head, $44,400. The wool-clips paid for shepherds and all current expenses. The result shows a net profit over the original investment of $69,520, equal to 193 per cent. per annum for eight years in succession. Per contra, out of a flock of 1,200 very fine selected ewes, worth $4 per head, 800 died during a storm of two days last March. The 400 that survived raised last summer more than that number of lambs. The dog is a valuable auxiliary in the care of sheep. The "Scotch collie" surpasses all others in his natural aptitude for this work, and oftentimes one well trained sells for $150.

How to Cook a Steak.

There is no mystery about broiling a beefsteak, and yet ninety-nine times in a hundred it is badly cooked. The simple art is to cook a steak without smoking it, and to retain the juices. When you rest your cake of Indian-ink on a palette, and happen to put your brush in your mouth and taste it, the peculiar savor is that of carbon. Now, carbon is one of the products of the imperfect combustion of hydro-carbon, and the best lampblack is made that way. If there is any taste of Indian-ink about a steak or chop, it is at fault. The art, then, is simply to broil without firing or blazing. No steak can be cooked without watching it. The fire must be very hot. The outside must be well cooked in order to keep the juice inside; but the outside must have scarce any thickness. The thing to do is to turn a steak from side to side, and to keep doing it. Never pepper or salt a steak until it is on the dish. To pepper it might not do so much harm, but to salt it is almost a crime. Never use a gridiron with too broad slats; that scores the beefsteak through, and fries overdone, dry portions. Incline your gridiron. If there is a blaze from the melting fat, the flame will burn beyond the steak. It is difficult to arrive at a proficiency with a steak which has too much fat on the edges. Trim your steak well, and, if there be fat on it, when your gridiron is inclined, let the fat portion be up toward the handle at first. Good steaks must be served instantaneously on a hot plate. Butter is admissible on a steak, but only in very minute quantity. If the crude steak be of good quality, cut an inch and an eighth thick, and, the cooking artistic, the juice of the meat follows every cut. We eat more beefsteaks, butchers know how to cut them more artistically, and we cook them better in the United States than in England. This is in accordance with the latest testimony furnished by Mr. Richard Grant White in the Atlantic Monthly.—Exchange.

California Lands.

There are 50,000,000 acres of land in California fit for cultivation, and not over 5,000,000 are in actual use for that purpose, and not over 8,000,000 are inclosed. Over 20,000,000 acres are held by land rings or individual monopolists for speculative purposes, in tracts of 125,000 to 300,000 acres. This state of things has long been felt to be a great check to the prosperity of the State. Under normal conditions men of small means might be expected to flock in large numbers to settle upon the rich farming land, and healthy, active, and enterprising agricultural communities would arise; but this has been rendered impossible by the refusal of the large land-owners to sell except at exorbitant prices. The new constitution that is now before the California people for adoption seeks to remedy this evil by providing that the taxation of lands held in large uncultivated tracts shall not be assessed, as heretofore, at the nominal value of 50 cents to $2.50 per acre, but that the same valuation shall be placed upon them as upon the small cultivated farms adjoining them. This will be from $20 to $60 per acre, according to location, and will make the annual tax on one of these small kingdoms $100,000 or more. It is believed that such assessments will soon cause the monopolists to sell their tracts for what they will fairly bring.

Tolling the Bell.

The custom of tolling the church bell on the death of a person is followed in Brockton, as in ye olden time. Few towns now observe this ancient usage. It is nearly half a century since the practice was discontinued in Plymouth. The habit was, as soon as a person was known to be dead, to toll the bell for a time; then, after a pause, two strokes were made for a male, or three for a female; next the age of the deceased was tolled. This was the "passing bell," originally rung that all people might pray for the departing soul.

THE CAUSE OF THE RAIN.

Away by the shore of the ocean blue,
In peacefulness known to the lonely few,
The wife and child of a sailor true
  Lived and toiled together.
Full many a weird and pleasing tale
Was told the boy, of sea and sail,
Of floating berg and northern gale,
  Of clear and cloudy weather.

Adown the west the king of day
Was hastening through the gates away,
In all his golden bright array,
  When home returned the skipper.
At evening, strolling on the sand,
He told the boy of many a land,
And slowly traced with his brawny hand
  The cross and the starry dipper.

'Twas midnight, and, [illegible] rest,
The boy stole softly from his nest,
To watch the moon in clouds of the west
  Play hide and seek with the water,
To laugh at the wind in its wild, wild race,
And again the stars of the heavens to trace;
But he thought that the dipper was out of place,
  And veiled Andromeda's daughter.

The sea was mad, for the wind was high,
The huge black clouds would soon go by,
But down fell torrents of rain from the sky
  And awoke the sleeping skipper.
And suddenly long and loud laughed he,
When the voice of his child broke forth in glee,
"Oh father! the king of the Northern sea
  Has upset his starry dipper."

More Unique than Modest.

Just before Lent, Lady Caithness, a distinguished English lady residing in Nice, gave a wonderful mask ball at her pretty hotel, which is described with much spirit in a letter to the Boston Advertiser. The dresses were mainly obtained from Paris. One of the costumes represented "perfect love"—a difficult character and one that would [illegible] a label, one would say. But the most marvelous costume was worn by a Paris lady, well known for the fancy balls she gives at home.

It was that of an Egyptian, and had it not been artistically perfect would certainly have been condemned as not quite modest. The wearer was first cased in rose-colored tights, from head to foot, and the dress, sent her from Egypt, was thoroughly exact, with its black satin girdle fastened lightly over the thigh, the long, flowing wings richly embroidered, and but imperfectly covering below the knees; the Egyptian sandals, the head-dress, the lower part of the face painted [illegible] gorgeous [illegible] and beautiful that [illegible] looked upon the wearer more as a statue than as a woman.

Connaught's Wedding-Cake.

The most remarkable feature of the wedding breakfast was the wedding-cake, or rather cakes, for the work was in duplicate,—one for the private table, and the other for the guests' table. It stood five feet six inches in height, and was shaped as a temple,—base, columns, vaulted roofs, and ornamentation cast in white sugar. It was built in the confectionery of Windsor Castle by Mr. Ponder, her majesty's chief confectioner. The superstructure consisted of two vaulted roofs, beautifully chased, and supported by two pillars with Corinthian capitals. At the four corners of the lower chamber were stationed four female figures, as clearly cut as if they had been chiseled, emblematic of the four continents—Europe, Asia, Africa, and America,—while at the intervals were cupids driving swans or doves. Within the balustrade, made up of dwarf pillars joined by a filigree work of fine lace, were the figures of Cupid and Psyche; while in plaques of sugar, on white satin panels, were the English and Prussian arms. The various pedestals bore the interwoven monograms of the bride and bridegroom, while the base was richly decorated with scroll brackets from which were suspended festoons of orange blossoms.—London Standard.

Sacrifices to Fashion.

The other day I came upon a new store in the city. The windows were fairly dazzling with color. A stray sunbeam falling upon them, the shop front flashed back a rainbow of blue and green and red and yellow, indigo, vermilion, umber and black and white. I paused to gaze. It was a store devoted to the modern fashion of adorning ladies' hats, bonnets, and dresses with birds and butterflies. All the corners of the earth had been ransacked to satisfy this new craze. Whole birds, birds' wings, tails, breasts, were here by the thousand. Butterflies and humming birds vied with each other in wealth of color and beauty of arrangement. It is true there are lots of stores in London devoted to specimens of "natural history," where these things may be purchased; but here is a shop full of them, not as studies or specimens, but as articles of adornment. Travelers and others tell me that bird-slaughter as a trade has now reached proportions which threaten the very extinguishment of some of the rarest, as well as gayest, species. One can understand this when it is stated on authority that a German dealer in this city recently received a consignment of 32,000 dead humming birds, 80,000 aquatic birds of several varieties, and 800,000 pairs of wings. This to one dealer alone; while at the same time all the other traders are increasing their orders to foreign shippers. There is something very sad in these figures. Surely, our women cannot think about the subject, or they would never promote this sacrifice of bird-life for a mere freak of fashion. The rage for feather trimmings has almost annihilated the ribbon trade of Coventry. Men, women, and children in that once busy city are starving because fashion has introduced a new style of ornament. So that to please the latest whim, birds must die and children must starve. You may stand "on the bridge at Coventry" now, and see scores of people loitering there, who, but for the supersedure of ribbons by feathers, would be busily at work in the locked-up mills.—London Cor. N. Y. Times.

An Old-Fashioned Reform.

There are so many new-fangled projects for the promotion of woman's industry, so many pretentious schemes for the development of æsthetic possibilities in the gentler sex, that it is almost with a sense of relief that we direct attention to an old-fashioned reform. This is the restoration of plain sewing as a branch in the course of instruction in the public schools of this city. The experiment has been tried with excellent results in Boston and Providence, and, indeed, in our own city is already taught in some of the primary departments. In February, 1878 a committee of the board of education was instructed to consider the propriety of introducing into the girls' departments instruction in sewing and needlework as one of the principal branches of the regular course. Early [illegible] the committee recommended [illegible] the primary schools the girls [illegible] in the [illegible] should [illegible] lessons [illegible] man[illegible] there[illegible] was [illegible], and [illegible] of ed[illegible] :—"I[illegible] to teach [illegible] department[illegible] not obligat[illegible] and [illegible] both [illegible] pupils have [illegible] they [illegible] sewing is not taught in a majority of the primary departments. The principle, however, seems to have been established. If "must be given" can be substituted for "may be given" in the manual as it stands, the practice can be enforced, and instruction in sewing be made obligatory on certain days of the week and in certain grades.

This is the object of the appeal which has been submitted to the board with the signature of 500 ladies of the highest social standing. The petition has something besides social influence behind it. These ladies are directing the work of the principal benevolent associations which extend a helping hand to the common sisterhood of women, and they speak from mature experience when they insist that sewing must be taught in our public schools. The directors of the Wilson Industrial School for Girls, who are the leaders in this movement, have conducted a sewing department for many years, and have become convinced that all the girls who attend the public schools should have the benefit of similar instruction. We believe that the experience of nearly all the ladies who labor on Sunday afternoons in the sewing schools connected with city churches is in accord with these conclusions. This work, which is now either half done or left undone in chapel or mission-room, could be done systematically in our schools. The arguments in favor of this sanitary reform are stated so compactly and so forcibly [illegible] in the petition which appears in our news columns, that we have no need to repeat them here. It is an appeal full of common sense, and we trust that the board of education will have the good judgment to accept the conclusions and act upon them.—N. Y. Tribune.

An [illegible] Beauty.

Lucy Hooper writes as follows to the Baltimore Gazette:

The "all Paris" of the Bois de Boulogue, the races and the opera has lost a prominent figure since the celebrated Madame Musard has gone mad. I am told that her husband intends soon to dispose of her hotels, her equipages, her jewels, &c., at public sale, as her case is a hopeless one and will probably soon end in death. There will be a sensational sale, for the lovers of gossip in Paris if ever it does take place. In the first place, her jewels, including her peerless parure of opals and diamonds, and her necklace of black pearls, once the property of the Empress Eugenie, are world-renowned. Her collection of bric-a-brac, porcelain, &c., is also said to be magnificent, including a set of antique delft, which was a present from the king of Holland and cost $6,000. As to her stables, they were the wonder of all Paris. Of a semi-circular form and adapted to hold some twenty horses, their fittings and furnishings were so superb that M. Musard used to issue tickets to have them viewed, as is done with the stables of royalty. Madame Musard once gave a breakfast in her stable, which was attended by all the masculine notabilities Paris. Her hotel was filled with fine, modern pictures, antique tapestries, costly bronzes and curiosities of all descriptions. She was exceedingly elegant and graceful in manner, and knew how to set off a dish better than any other woman in Paris. An American by birth, and of the humblest origin, she had at least this merit—she tried, and successfully, to educate herself. She was an accomplished linguist, an amateur artist of no mean talent, and a very finished and gracious hostess. Her entertainments were the talk of the city. Yet there was one flaw in the brilliant life that she led; she never could get a respectable woman to visit her. Men came, and in crowds, but never a person who by any stretch of the imagination could be called a lady. She gave immense sums to charities, and at Albani's latest benefit, at Les Italiens, the bouquet that was thrown to the prima donna from her loge concealed amid its blossoms a superb bracelet of diamonds and emeralds. Yet even her generosity was of no avail; the respectable personages of her own sex would not visit her. I remember seeing her at one of the last performances ever given at Les Italiens, alone in the seclusion of her vast proscenium box. Her dress was a marvel of richness. It was composed pale blue satin, but the groundwork of the material had almost completely disappeared under the flowers in exquisite silk embroidery, in their natural hues, wherewith it was covered. Head, neck, arms and breast blazed with a very constellation of diamonds. The antique fan that she carried was worth in itself a small fortune. Her opera cloak was of white satin bordered with Russia sable. Here she sat in magnificent solitude, notorious and alone. Her beauty even then had wholly waned, except the supple graces of her still perfect form. Now the subtle brain that lent that beauty its power and successes has also given way. There is no one to mourn—there is no one even to regret her. Would it not have been better for her to have ended her days in her native land and in her original station as the wife of some good workingman, washing her own dishes and making her own clothes, but still a contented wife and mother? And I wonder if the King of Holland, amid the first flush of his new conjugal joys, ever gives a thought to the poor mad woman now locked up under the care of the great physician for the insane, the well known Dr. Blanche.

Fashion Notes.

"INDISTINCT checks" is the new term for the designs in India dress goods.

STRAW hats and bonnets are to come in shades to match the costumes. One may buy either hat or dress first.

GLOVES in all the shades of roseau are worn with black costumes. The new shades of light blue are reproduced in long mitts that are now worn for the evening; later on in the season these will be worn with street dresses.

MANY of the new collars and cuffs have chintz bindings of sateen covered with tiny rosebuds. In every day lingerie are seen long white linen waistcoats, beautifully embroidered and edged with Breton lace, and white, pink and blue Indian muslin neckties trimmed with Breton lace.

MANY of the new bonnets are lined with gathered satin and trimmed with grasses of the new reed green called "roseau," satin ribbons of the same shade being passed plainly over the crown, tying down the sides and terminating in a bow and strings beneath the chin.

A NEW and pretty idea for spring costumes of wash goods is to make a necktie of the dress material. Stamp the ends in an elaborate pattern and embroider in different colored embroidery cotton. Later in the season wide-brimmed straw hats, for country wear, may be trimmed with a scarf of the dress goods.

CAMEL's hair suits are trimmed with fla embroidered or brocaded stuffs or are hand embroidered. This last method is used for the most distinguished and complete of woolen costumes, the embroidery being executed in various colors and shades and either outlining the jacket, vest, cuffs and overskirt, or forming a plastron in front, and cuffs upon the sleeves, besides pieces which are so put on as to show upon the drapery or at the sides of the skirt.

A Thrice Rejected Song that Became Famous.

Hood's touching lyric, "The Song of the Shirt," was the work of an evening. The author was prompted to write it by the condition of thousands of working women in the city of London. The effect of its production was foreseen by two persons—the poet's wife and Mark Lemon, editor of Punch.

"Now mind, Tom; mind my words," said his devoted wife, "this will tell wonderfully. It is one of the best things you ever did."

Mr. Lemon, looking over his letters one morning, opened an envelope enclosing a poem, which the writer said had been rejected by three London journals. He begged the editor to consign it to the waste-paper basket if it was not thought suitable for Punch, as the author was "sick of the sight of it." The poem was signed Tom Hood, and was entitled "The Song of the Shirt."

It was submitted to the weekly meeting and principle contributors, several of whom opposed its publication as unsuitable for the pages of a comic journal. Mr. Lemon, however, was so firmly impressed with its beauty that he published it on December 16, 1843.

"The Song of the Shirt" trebled the sale of the paper, and created a profound sensation throughout Great Britain. People of every sort were moved by it. It was chanted by ballad singers in the streets of London, and drew tears from the eyes of princes. Seven years after the author's death, the English people erected a monument over his grave. The rich gave guineas, the laborers and sewing-women gave shillings and pence. Sculptured on it is the inscription devised by himself: "The Song of the Shirt."

Expensive Livery.

Hay is so expensive in the new Colorado mining center entitled Leadville, that collateral security is demanded by livery-stable keepers whenever a horse is left in their keeping for even a short period. One night a man drove up to one of the corrals with a span of rather lean horses which he had just driven over the range. He called out to the corral keeper: "Say, captain, I'd like to leave my outfit here." "All right, sir, drive in." The clerk called to the boss as soon as the owner of the team had left the stable: "Say, that man is going to Ten Mile in the morning, to be gone a week." The stranger was called back. "Going to leave this team here a week?" "Yes, sir; about a week, I reckon." "Well, my friend, you will have to leave me some security for the care and feed of this team." "Heavens, man," replied the stranger, "ain't the team security enough?" "No, sir; hay is worth $150 a ton, and if you should leave that team in my care for a week, and anything should happen to prevent your coming back for it, the horses and wagon wouldn't bring enough to cover the livery bill. I'd rather you'd take 'em somewhere else."

A Mayor's Notion of a Sardine.

Just after the close of the war a public meeting of the citizens of Concord, N. H., was called to decide upon a proper reception of the returning veterans. A sub-committee on collation was appointed, the chairman being the then mayor of the city, a gentleman more widely known for the excellence of the mackerel kits manufactured by him than for the extent of his book learning. Upon the question as to what should constitute the menu at the collation, the mayor named sardines among other things. A heated debate arose, during which a member of the committee mildly suggested that perhaps his honor did not know what sardines were! This called Mayor H— to his feet, and he angrily retorted: "I think I know what a sardine is as well as any member of this committee; it is two pieces of bread and a piece of meat?" It is unnecessary to add that the house came down.

Seth Green's Advice to Anglers.

In a letter to the Rochester Express, Seth Green, who has wide fame as a fly-fisher as well as a fishculturist, gives the following hints to anglers, which are timely, as the trout season will soon open:

"I am asked a great many times, What is the secret of fly-casting, or how it is that I take the prize when I [illegible]? There are three principles: First, pick out of water [illegible] second, give the line time to straighten behind you; third, [illegible]. I will explain these principles more definitely.

"Raise [illegible] rod to an angle of about forty-five [illegible] back of you [illegible] make a [illegible] stroke forward; [illegible] stroke [illegible] carrying your [illegible] ward. When you take the [illegible] from the water it should be done with a jerk; then give your line time to straighten behind; then give it the same stroke forward that you did to get it out of the water.

"Why so many fail in fly casting is, they throw the rod backward too near the ground behind them, and when they make the forward stroke, when the line gets straightened out, it is some distance above the water and kinks back, and when it falls upon the water it lies crooked and is some distance short of what it would have been if it had struck the water as soon as it was straightened out.

"If a fish should strike at your flies at this time, you are pretty sure to miss him. By never throwing your rod back more than an angle of forty-five degrees, and making the stroke forward, your line goes straight out and the flies go to the point you desire.

"Great care should be taken when you have thrown the line behind you that the line is given time to straighten before making the stroke forward. I have thrown seventy feet of line against a strong wind, first by giving my rod a quick, strong back stroke, carrying my rod not further back than an angle of forty-five degrees, and giving the line time to straighten behind me, and making the same stroke forward that I did to get it back of me.

"I nearly forgot to mention that it is more important to have your line fit your rod than it is to have your coat fit your back, unless you are a fop, and if you are, my advice is to not go a fishing.

"You may think it strange that I should tell you three or four times over in the same article that, in order to do good fly-casting you must not throw your rod back only just so far, and then wait for your line to straighten behind you, and when your rod is up to make a quick stroke forward, without carrying your rod forward even a little, before you deliver your line."

Fig Culture.

In a paper on "Fig Culture at the North a Success," Mr. G. F. Nedham of Washington makes the emphatic statement that no other crop can be raised which will give so certain and so large returns in our middle and northern states as that delicious fruit, the fig. He says: The fig flourishes in much more unfavorable climates than our own. In Great Britain, for instance, figs have been grown in the open air for more than 300 years; the original trees brought from Italy by Cardinal Pole still bearing. Now, if in that damp, foggy, "misty, moisty" atmosphere, where melons and cucumbers cannot be grown, the fig will succeed, how much more will it flourish in our bright and sunny climate! The climate of our north temperate zone is one of the best possible for the full development of the fig. It is a well-known fact that too great heat is inimical to this plant; it causes the tree to cast its fruit. Our northern climes are superior to the southern for another reason—our days are several hours longer than at the south, which gives a lengthened and tempered day, which precisely suits the fig. Countries where figs are grown as an article of commerce are exposed to similar vicissitudes of climate as are our northern states. I have before me a letter from a gentleman in Massachusetts in which he says: "I was born in the Levant, and I was a resident in Constantinople one winter when the Golden Horn (the Bosphorus) was frozen over, and there was a snow fall of eighteen to twenty inches for a couple of weeks, without injury to the fig trees in the vicinity." The reason that the fig yields so abundantly is not only that it is prolific, but, first, because the fruit has no insect enemies, and secondly, the wood has no blight or disease. Every other species of fruit trees gives the grower a world of trouble on account of these. Of these facts all are too well aware. Common sense is quite as necessary in fig growing as elsewhere. A correspondent informs me that he has a "fig tree with 35 sprouts." What kind of an apple tree would that be? He would have to wait a long time for any apples, and then they would be "smaller by degrees and beautifully less." Cut off all the sprouts but one and plant them, and "in the sweet by-and-by" you will have 35 trees.

The writer gives the testimony of Gen. Worthington, after an experience of years in cultivating figs in Ohio, that the fig plant suits the climate there wonderfully, is easily protected, is a sure bearer, and is very prolific. When four or five years old the trees produce from the same area, with less labor, a greater and more certain crop than either potatoes of tomatoes. What is true of Ohio the writer claims is true of the whole north.

A Few Distinguished Gluttons.

Viewed in the light of Dr. Boerhave's theory, the gastronomic exploits of ancient and modern savages may gain an additional interest. How desirable it would be to know by which vicarious virtue His Majesty the Emperor Vitellius could atone for the oft-repeated sin of devouring three brace of peacock at a sitting, which Suetonius assures us did not prevent him from appearing in the palestra an hour afterward and joining in the games which which were prolonged by torchlight toward the morning hour! Vendome, the champion of France and the one strategic peer ever opposed to Marlborough, was as formidable at the mess-table as on the battle-field. He would gorge himself till his joints commenced to tremble and the oppression of his chest threatened him with asphyxia. Woe to the waiter or messmate who offended him by word or want of attention in such moments! A fierce blow, a hurled tumbler or a tremendous kick were the mildest expressions of his impatience. After the defeat of Oudenarde he saved the French army by a masterly retreat, he kept himself in the saddle two days and two nights, and then restored himself, not by sleep, but by [illegible] a banquet of sixteen [illegible], during which he incorporated a [illegible] pounds of mutton pie, if we may believe Chateaubriand.—Popular Science Monthly.

About Temperance [illegible].

At the greatest epochs of antiquity were [illegible] temperance. The Chinese, who [illegible] were a civilized people cultivating learning and arts, when our Saxon ancestors were savages clothed in the skin of wild beasts, not only prohibited drinking wine, but uprooted all the grapevines in the execution of their laws. They didn't [illegible] one thing and practice another. In Egypt, through the reign of 350 kings, down to within 600 years of Christ, never a ruler in the land of the Nile drank wine or strong drink. In India the higher class never drink; it is contrary to their religion. The Persians were the same; their drink was water. The Jews, while they were permitted a limited use of wine, were never intemperate. So the Greeks made drunkenness infamous; and the Carthagenians would not permit their judges to drink, nor permit their soldiers to have wine in camp. They endured their long marches, they scaled the Alps, they fought the bloody battles which carried them in victory to the gates of Rome, on cold water. Confucius, Buddah, Moses, Socrates, Mahomet and Jesus, the founders of all the great religions of the world, were strictly and persistently temperance men, and so have been the leading religionists and moralists down to the present hour.

The Youthful Hugo.

Of M. Victor Hugo, Mrs. Hooper tells this anecdote: A good many years ago the father of the present head of a Parisian publishing house was offered a manuscript by a pale young man with a large forehead. The publisher glanced over page and saw that the work was in verse. Without attempting to read it, he handed it politely back to the young author with a few of the usual phrases about poetry being a drug in the market, depression of trade, etc., etc. "I am sorry for your sake," said the young man impressively, as he pocketed the rejected manuscript. "I was about to propose to you a contract by which I would have assured to you the right to all the future productions of my pen. It was a fortune that I was about to offer to you—but you refuse, and so no more need be said." He bowed and withdrew. The publisher, struck by his manner, reflected for a moment, and then hastened after his visitor to call him back. But he was too late—the young man had already disappeared. "Never before or since," the old gentleman was wont to say when relating this story, "have I ever met with a young author who so fully believed in his own powers, nor with one that had so much reason for such belief, for my visitor was Victor Hugo."

Married a Car Driver.

Sarah Hill, of Providence, R. I., is the rich girl who recently married a horse-car driver, and Bernard McDonald, 24 years old, and 12 years in this country, is the man. Miss Hill, though not distinguished for beauty, was noted for brightness in conversation, grace of manners, and above all a taste for dress that touched upon genius. She came to New York about two years ago to reside with her sister, Mrs. Morris Barnwell, at Fifty-sixth street and Broadway. Her family is wealthy, and she moved in the best circles. It was one day last winter that she met her fate, when she had occasion to ride up town in a Seventh avenue car, and some weeks later she told her guardian what she proposed to do. Protests were of no avail, and, on Feb. 19, Father Donovan performed the ceremony in the church of St. John the Evangelist. The couple took lodgings with Mrs. Brown in the top story of a tenement at Fiftieth street and Seventh avenue. Barney is, from all accounts, an honest, industrious fellow, and will start up in some small business in New street.—New York Sun.

A Hymn of Praise Abruptly Ended.

The old ladies of Connecticut are among the best story-tellers in New England. Mrs. Hannah Forward Clark, of East Granby, is now in her 95th year, and yet tells with grim humor a quaint tale of the olden time when it was the custom to "line hymns in meeting." The deacon adjusted his spectacles, raised his psalm book and incidentally said, "I'm almost blind," and the congregation took up the words and sung them as a line. The deacon, greatly annoyed, explained, "I can scarcely see at all," but this also was sung in solemn measure. In holy indignation the deacon raised both hands and exclaimed, "You're all bewitched!" and this, too, was rendered into praise; whereupon the deacon vociferated loudly, "The devil's in every one of you!" Such a change in the sentiment as well as the meter, brought the singers to a standstill, and after some confusion they sang the proper psalm.

An Adventurous Prussian Officer.

The attendant upon the "Red Prince" at the recent great wedding at Windsor was Col. Von Borcke, an adventurous Prussian officer. He went to the United States during the civil war and fought gallantly for the South, was shot through the left lung, and then went to London invalided. He was in London several months, and during his visit wrote an account of his adventures for Blackwood's Magazine, while he was the hero of a colony of Southern ladies in the smoky capital. It is related that Von Borcke, who is six feet two inches high, cut the head of a Union soldier clean from the shoulders with one blow of a huge two-handed sword.

THE pedestrian epidemic has suggested to the intellect of the Whitehall Times a new reading of an old proverb: "Heads I lose, heels you win."

Sixth National Reunion at Cambridge, Ohio.

The Executive Committee having in charge the reunion of the Federal and Confederate soldiers, which takes place at Cambridge, Ohio, August 26, 27, 28 and 29, have issued the following circular:

To all Soldiers and Sailors of the Late War, North and South:

The National Reunion Executive Committee, recognizing the fact that nothing will so effectually soften the sectional feelings engendered by our late terrible struggle as all occasional gathering together from all parts of our common country the survivors of those scenes and events that are most memorable in the history of the land and remembering the great pleasure experienced by the thousands of old veterans who have clasped the social hand at former encampments of this National organization, have determined that the sixth meeting shall be the grandest of its kind ever held upon the continent. Our facilities for making it such are unlimited. Congress has recognized it as being of national importance by authorising the Secretary of War to issue, free of cost, arms, ammunition and artillery for salutes and sham battles, camp equipage, and tents to shelter the multitudes, and many of the most prominent Generals of both armies and leading statesmen of the day have signified a determination to be present and participate in the grand jubilee. All branches of the service will be represented, delegations are expected from every State in the Union, and all railroads will grant excursion rates. Regular camps with comfortable quarters will be established to accommodate companies or parties, besides ample hotel and boarding house accommodations can be had at reasonable rates. No more favorable place could have been selected for a great gathering of this kind than Cambridge. In close connection by rail with all parts of the country, no vexatious delays need be feared in coming. Her beautiful groves and never failing springs afford special advantages to all who may desire to renew their recollections of "tenting on the old camp-ground," while from grand elevations that surround the city may be witnessed the marshaling of veterans "in battle array," which will be a prominent feature of the occasion.

[illegible] value of [illegible] infantile [illegible] of various kinds [illegible] of [illegible] theory [illegible] During the past [illegible] months [illegible] have been testing, with uniformly successful results, the value of a very simple method of treating such infantile complaints as atrophy, bronchitis, convulsions, diarrhea, febrile disturbances [illegible] and [illegible] disorders of childhood which are [illegible] by an unnatural state of the skin.

"The treatment simply consists in smearing with salad oil the whole surface of the body, from the crown of the head to the tips of the fingers and toes, the process being repeated every twelve six, or even four hours, according to the urgency of the case. Of course, the use of a long flannel gown or small blanket is obvious, and the fluid should be slightly warmed.

"The application of oil possesses the following immense advantages over the ordinary warm bath:

"1. Skin-action is more completely and permanently [illegible].

"2. The danger of reaction is avoided, for there is no sudden change of temperature; and, moreover, the [illegible] of oil protects the surface from atmospheric influences.

"4. It does not depress, but, on the contrary, appears to exhilarate.

"It will scarcely be credited by many that the formidable affections above mentioned will frequently yield to this treatment, or, at any rate, show signs of abatement in from twenty minutes to four and twenty hours: but such is the case, though sometimes forty eight or even seventy-two hours will elapse before any decided signs of improvement occur."

Soldiers' Graves in Private Cemeteries.

The following circular from Capt. [illegible] F. Rockwell, of the U. S. army, who has charge of the national cemeteries, has been furnished the press of the north for publication:

"It is probably generally remembered that some years ago—in 1873—congress passed a law providing for the erection of durable headstones over the graves of soldiers of the regular and volunteer forces of the United States whose remains are enterred in the national military cemeteries. This law has been carried out, and the graves of the nation's dead in these cemeteries are now permanently marked. At the instance of the war department, congress has recently authorized the erection of similar headstones over the graves of the Union soldiers who are buried in private and village cemeteries. This will be done as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. In the meantime the Quartermaster General, at Washington, will at once proceed to collect the necessary information as to where these headstones are required.

All persons having any knowledge of the burial places of soldiers in private cemeteries whose graves are not marked, are requested to communicate the fact to the Quartermaster General, and give regiment, company, and date of death of deceased, if known. Similar information is desired from parties in charge of such cemeteries.

Of course it is not intended to furnish headstones for graves over which monuments have already been erected by relatives or friends of the deceased."

Advertising.

What is advertising?

The art of exciting curiosity.

What is curiosity?

A feeling of inquisitiveness, which nothing short of investigation or trial will satisfy.

What is the result of creating this feeling?

Prosperity and riches to the advertiser.

Who are the most inquisitive people in the world?

The American people. (If you don't believe this, ask Barnum's What Is It, or the old man himself.)

Ergo, if you would succeed in advertising, excite curiosity, and our word for it, backed by years of experience and observation, you will hit the mark every time.

Grafting Eyes upon the Blind.

To the Ed[illegible] Scientific American:

In our c[illegible] as elsewhere, there are large [illegible] of blind persons because [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] is unable to [illegible] the influence of [illegible]; [illegible] in [illegible] communication to the brain. This is an established fact of ocular science.

It is also true that where a finger may be entirely severed from the hand, by accident or otherwise, if taken in season, [illegible] properly [illegible] in [illegible] grow, the [illegible] the nerv[illegible] fingers [illegible] same [illegible] grafting [illegible] the [illegible] healthy [illegible] fore[illegible] reason [illegible] observed, a sound, healthy eye could not be ingrafted on the muscles and nerves, which had previously been severed from an imperfect eye?

In this and all other communities there are annually [illegible] numbers of criminals put to death under sentence of capital punishment. Whatever may be said of the moral condition of these criminals, it is certain that their physical condition is usually good. The question [illegible] here arise, do these unfortunate persons possess anything that may be preserved and become useful to the humanity they have outraged? It would, of course seem cruel and inhuman even to propose the extraction of the eyes, or other essential organs, before death, or where there was a possibility of the individual regaining consciousness.

But in this connection we may ask if it is necessary to perpetuate the time honored (or rather dishonored) mode of executing criminals by strangulation; or would it seem any more inhuman to civilized beings to cause death by means of chloroform or ether? If not, could not the criminal who is to give up his life, and the patient who is blind, be placed under the influence of ether at the same time, and the transfer effected before life becomes extinct on the part of the criminal? [illegible] would be a painless way of expiating the sentence of the law.

As a matter of course, doubtless, many patient and delicate experiments would have to be performed before the plan here proposed could be brought to success; but such experiments, I think, may be performed on dumb animals, using every precaution to prevent unnecessary suffering.

Gems of Sentiment.

[The two following poems, both beautiful and pathetic in the extreme, are herewith published as an illustration of the gratitude existing in the southern heart towards the people of the north; and we reproduce them in the belief that they are faithful word-paintings of the general sentiment of a grateful people. The first was written by Mr. Emmet L. Ross, editor of the Canton (Miss.) Mail, and it cannot fail to be appreciated by every person who has any claim to a love of the beautiful. The second —"Conquered at Last"—is a prize poem composed by Miss Maria L. Eve, of Augusta, Ga. It won the prize offered by the Mobile News, as being the finest production amongst a list of seventy-seven competitive compositions. It needs no words of commendation, as it speaks most eloquently for itself].

THE SOLID SOUTH.

Awake! awake, O sluggish Muse!
If only for awhile,
And tune my harp to Homer's lyre—
Blind bard of Scio's isle—
That I may sing in fitting words
Songs of enduring praise
To willing hands and noble hearts
Who, in affliction's days,
Poured out upon our sunny land
Their stores of love and wealth
That brought success to pestilence,
And wooed back joyous health.
A solid South pours out her heart this bright, this glad New Year.
And sends a message to all men, all nations far and near;
A message draped with willow leaves, bedewed with holy tears
Of widowed wife and orphaned child, sad youth and tottering years;
A message from her palaces, from cottage, hill and glade,
From council halls, from field and farm, and busy marts of trade;
A message freighted down with love, with gratitude as great
As ever woke a soul to arms, or bared a breast for State;
A love that throbs in every heart, a gratitude that thrills,
And breaks its bounds like waves that rush to sea from swelling rills.
Some mother bending o'er the tomb that holds her cherished boy,
Some stricken wife beside the grave where rests her girlhood's joy,
Some maiden weeping o'er the mound where troth and lover lie,
Press back their sobs and in their prayers call blessings from on high
Down on the heads, the hearts, the homes of those whose helping han
Brought succor to our stricken ones and saved our suffering land,
The Southron's hand that erstwhile drew his sabre from its sheath
And dipped its blade in brother's blood to win the patriot's wreath,
Now presses on a throbbing breast in pledge to self and God,
That Peace and Love shall ever reign where hostile armies trod.
The fires of hate that lit his soul, nor sword nor gun could quell—
These yield to Love's bewitching wiles, to Love's all conquering spell;
Deep in his heart is writ the name, the pure, unselfish zeal
Of him who dared the Saffron Foe, to conquer woe with weal.
More holy task was never borne than that brave Benner tried,
No loss more great, no grief more deep, than when brave Benner died;
No gift in all the bounty sent, more rich, more rare in price,
No words can compensate the boon—our Nation's sacrifice.
Ten million grateful hearts enshrine his memory in their breast,
Ten million tongues his deed extol, invoke his spirit's rest;
A solid South reveres his name, his valor undefiled—
One common country's love will shield the martyr's wife and child.
O, Great Jehovah, King of Kings!
Whose mighty hands control
The fate of worlds, the works of men,
And Time's unceasing roll—
Let blessings follow in the path
Of Sorrow's fading tread;
Let comfort come to those who mourn
And weep above their dead;
Pour down unmeasured blessings, Lord,
Thy choicest and thy best,
To crown our brothers of the North
And far-off East and West;
Blot out the lines that would divide
And desecrate our sod,
Bind close our States, give us one Law,
One Union and one God.

"CONQUERED AT LAST."

You came to us once, O brothers, in wrath,
And rude desolation followed your path.
You conquered us then, but only in part
For a stubborn thing is the human heart.
Their heads in the dust and their branches broke,
But how shall he soften their hearts of oak?
You swept o'er our land like the whirlwind's wing,
But the human heart is a stubborn thing.
We laid down our arms, we yielded our will;
But our heart of hearts was unconquered still.
"We are vanquished," we said, "but our wounds must heal,"
We gave you our swords, but our hearts were steel.
"We are conquered," we said, but our hearts were sore,
And "woe to the conquered" on every door,
But the spoiler came and he would not spare,
The angel that walketh in darkness was there:—
He walked thro' the valley, walked thro' the street
And he left the print of his firey feet,
In the dead, dead, dead, that were everywhere,
And buried away with never a prayer.
From the desolate land, from its very heart,
There went forth a cry to the uttermost part,—
You hear it O brothers!—With never a measure
You opened your hearts, and poured out your treasure.
O! Sisters of Mercy, you gave above these!
For you helped, we know, on your bended knees
Your pity was human, but oh! it was more,
When you shared our cross and our burden bore;
Your lives in your hands you stood by our side;
Your lives for our lives you laid down and died,
And no greater love hath a man to give
Than lay down his life that his friends may live
You poured in our wounds the oil and the wine,
That you brought to us from a Hand Divine,
You conquered us, brothers; our swords we gave;
We yield now our hearts,—they are all we have.
Our last ditch was there, and it held out long;
It is yours, O friends! and you'll find it strong.
Your love had a magic, diviner than art,
And "Conquered by Kindness" we'll write on our heart.

Democratic Doctrine.

At a recent caucus held by the democrats in congress, Representative Stephens, of Georgia, offered the following resolution, with a request that it be read and held for the action of a future caucus.

Resolved, that the aims and objects of the democracy of the United States as far as we—chosen by them—members of the present house of representatives, are entitled to be considered as true exponents of these aims and objects are directed with a singleness of purpose to the restoration of constitutional liberty, and with it the restoration of peace, harmony and prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the land. They abjure the renewal of sectional strife; they accept all legitimate results of the late lamented war; they are utterly opposed to the revival in this country, or any part thereof, of African slavery or any other kind of slavery, or involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime. They stand pledged to maintain the union of states under the constitution, with all its existing amendments, as they shall be expounded by the supreme court of the United States. They are against all unconstitutional or revolutionary modes. They are for law and order, for the protection of life and liberty and property, without respect of persons or social conditions; for redress of all grievances they look alone to the peaceful instrumentality of the constitution—first the law-making power, second the law-expounding power, third the executing power, and finally the ultimate sovereign power of the ballot-box. They are for free ballot, as well as for a fair and just count. While they are opposed to a large standing army, yet they are for keeping the army sufficiently large to repel invasion, defend our extensive frontier, as well as all the necessary interior forts and garrisons, and to enable the president to put down domestic violence or insurrection in any of the states, and in aid of the civil officers as a posse comitatus in the execution of legal processes, in pursuance of the constitution, and as provided in acts of congress of 1795 and 1809. But they are utterly opposed to the use of the military forces of the United States in controlling or in any way interfering with the freedom of elections. The are for the maintenance of the public credit inviolate, but are utterly opposed to an increase of the bonded debt, unless the exegecies of war should render it necessary. They are for the retrenchment of expenditures, lessening the burdens of taxation and a thorough reform in the present unequal and unjust method of raising revenue. They are for placing the coinage of gold and silver upon the same footing, without restriction or limitation upon the amount of either. They are for reviving the languishing and perishing industries of the country by an increase of the volume of currency—founded on sound basis—sufficient to meet the urgent demands of trade in every department of labor and business.

In the Tate murder trial at Indianapolis recently, Judge Harrington was one of the attorneys for the state, and Major J. W. Gordon, the principal attorney for the defense. In addressing the jury Major Gordon took occasion to slander the wife of Judge Harrington without the least grounds of justification, and during the absence of the judge who, when he learned of the language made use of by Gordon, at once demanded an apology, to which Gordon made an evasive answer. Harrington then sent a messenger to Gordon requesting a meeting "outside of the state" which was declined by Gordon. The next day Judge Harrington caused to be published in the News the following card, to which the brave (?) and bullying Major has failed to reply.

To Major J. W. Gordon:

I wrote you a letter this morning, under cover, which you refused to receive and were too cowardly to accept. I take this method of reaching you. I, in my first letter, demanded that you should retract the low and vile language you used on Saturday when I was not present. Your answers to me were evasive, equivocal and pusillanimous. Now, in view of your declining to accept my last letter, I would like to know what you meant when you stated, in the presence of the court and spectators, that you were personally responsible for what you said, with the bragadocio of a coward, who dares not open a letter addressed to him on the subject matter.

I am compelled, in view of your pusillanimity, to brand you in this matter before the public as an infamous, vile slanderer, a liar and a coward, a disgrace to your species, and a nuisance among mankind. H. W. HARRINGTON.

WHAT A SOUTHERN EDITOR THINKS OF GOV. HENDRICKS.

"Indiana has but one Candidate for President, and there he Stands."

Col. P. Donan, editor of the the Bentonville (Ark.) Advance, a gentleman with whom we are personally acquainted and one who enjoys an enviable reputation as a writer through the southern states, sends to his home paper a graphic description of a recent trip to our capital city, where he interviewed Gov. Williams and ex-Gov. Hendricks concerning our national affairs. A portion of his letter we have extracted and here reproduce:

INDIANAPOLIS, March 30.

" * * * * I spent the evening with

GOVERNOR HENDRICKS,

the democratic vice-president elect, and his bright and charming wife, at their handsome quarters at the Bates House. Campaign photographs, charts and badges have rendered his appearance familiar to every American; his large, intellectual head, his strongly marked features, his stoutly proportioned frame and the air of calm self-poised dignity that rests upon him like a mantle. He shows no evidence of having chafed unavailingly over the radical knavery and democratic foolery that cost him the second place in our government. Not one additional gray hair seems to have made its appearance, not one additional wrinkle to have plowed its furrow of care or disappointment across his brow. He has a large and lucrative law practice to which he assiduously devotes himself; and, esteemed and beloved by all the people among whom he lives, recognizedly the first man of his great and growing state, and surrounded by hosts of warm and unwavering friends, he has everything to render life pleasant, and certainly has no reason to envy the man who stole the seat to which he was elected. He feels and freely expresses a deep solicitude in regard to the future of the country. He says Grant will undoubtedly be the radical nominee for the presidency, and his re-election means revolution—an end of our present form of government. He thinks it probable that a life-presidency would be given him and that a re-reconstruction of the South would follow. Alluding to some of the recent extreme utterances and acts of so-called southern representative men, Governor Hendricks said, 'They ought always to remember that where a clearly sectional issue is raised, a section that contains 35,000,000 people will, in the end, certainly prove too strong for one with only 8,000,000; they cannot be too careful.' It has been reported that the governor is in favor of Tilden's renomination, but I think I can assure you that in any enthusiastic or multitudinous way as a first choice. He holds that, if the Indiana democrats had not carried their state in October, 1876, Tilden could not have carried it or New York in November; and there seems little reason to doubt that any democrat whose influence would be sufficient to carry Indiana and Ohio in October would be just as apt to carry New York the month after as Mr. Tilden. One thing is certain, the Indiana democrats are a unit for Hendricks, and you hear it at every turn. During the evening a steady tide of visitors poured into his cosy parlor, among the number some of the most prominent men in the state, of both political parties. One was Hon. Wm. H. English, whose name has recently been brought out by some of the New York papers for the presidency. He was the author of the famous "English Bill," by which the democrats in congress were compromised out of a dangerous and apparently inextricable dilemma during the struggle over the admission of Kansas. He is a man of a high order of ability and culture and immense fortune, and will probably be Indiana's next democratic senator. Speaking of the movement to put him on the presidential track, he said, pointing to Gov. Hendricks: 'Indiana has but one candidate for the presidency, and there he stands.' Another visitor was Col. Gordon, a lawyer of eminence and one of the leading radical wire pullers in the state. During the evening, talking of the coming contest, he remarked, 'There is one democrat in the United States for whom I would vote against Grant;' and as he bowed himself out, he said to Mrs. Hendricks 'It the democrats of Indiana and the country do their duty, there would be some compensation even for the defeat of my party in the fact that I would be sure of finding the truest type of gentleman and lady in the White House.'

HE IS NOT FOR SAMMY

And so it goes everywhere; you hear it on the streets, in the counting-rooms and offices and parlors. My old friend Maynard, chief editor of the Sentinel and one of the level-headedest men in the profession, echoed it, and Shoemaker, the manager of the paper, swelled the echo. Ex-Sheriff Cooper, big in body, brain, heart and fortune, joined the chorus; Piercy, of the Auditor's office, and a legion of others prolonged the strain. The burden of it all is Hendricks, and I do not believe that even saintly George Harding, of the Sunday Herald, whose paper is too good to be published on week-days, would sling any heavy discords into the tune if he could. You may rest assured that Indiana democrats are going to make a gigantic effort to put their man in front next time. Other aspirants may nota bene. P. D."

Choir or Congregation?

Dr. Holland, in a discussion of church music, in Scribner for May, writes as follows:

For ourselves, we are very much afraid of the movement toward congregational music. The tendency thus far has been to depreciate not only the quality of music, in the churches, but the importance of it, and to make public worship very much less attractive to the great world which it is the church's duty and policy to attract and to influence. The churches are full, as a rule, where the music is excellent. This fact may not be very flattering to preachers, but it is a fact, and it is quite a legitimate question whether a church has a right to surrender any attraction that will give it a hold upon the attention of the world, especially if the attraction is an elevating one, and in the direct line of Christian influence. Congregational singing is well enough in its place and proportions, but very little of the inspiration of music comes through it. It is, indeed, more of a torture than a pleasure to many musical and devout people. The ideal arrangement, as it seems to us, is a first class quartette, made up of soloists, who take a prominent part in the public service, with a single choral in each service given to the congregation to sing. In this way, the two offices of music in public religious assemblies seem to be secured more surely and satisfactorily than in any other.

Warren's Address as Actually Delivered.

Stand! The ground's your own, my braves, for haven't you bought it, got the deed at home? Will ye give it up to slaves? If you do you are an unhappier lot of imbeciles than I took you to be when I organized the regiment. Will ye look for greener graves? I hope to goodness you will not waste your time so foolishly. The graves here are plenty green enough for any body, and, besides, I doubt if you could find any greener ones if you were to turn the county udside down. Perhaps ye hope for mercy still? If so I advise you to give it up. What's the mercy despots feel? Hear it in that battle peal, which shakes a fellow up almost as lively as a banana peel. Read it in you bristling steel, those of you that can read, and you that can't will then begin to realize what you have lost by telling your parents you were in a hurry for your breakfast so that you could be the first ones to school, when at the same time you had your pockets full of fishing worms and raw liver. I'm down on a boy that plays hookey. Fear ye foes who kill for hire—say $13 a month and found? I can't believe it. Will ye to your homes retire? I guess not; they are on fire, as you will observe by looking behind you. Look before you! See the low-flung rascals who have done it! From the vale on they come, and will ye quail? No quail on mine, if you please. Salt pork and hardtack are plenty good enough for me, and the first sardine of them that shows his miserable head above the horizon I'll scatter his brains against the setting sun, if I don't lay up a cent.

The Chicago Herald thus makes its predictions for next year, on the strength of the late democratic victory in that city: "The carrying of Chicago by the democracy at this time insures their carrying the state next year, and when Illinois goes democratic what can the republicans hope to carry? Even Iowa, Michigan and Vermont will be in doubt. The truth is, the sins, corruptions, hypocrisy and inconsistencies of the republican party have been more than any organization could bear; and while it continues to so handicap itself it can have no hope of success."

THE EAST.

Gen. Richard Taylor, of the Confederate army, died in New York last week. He was the only son of the late President Taylor.

A distinct shock of earthquake was felt in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., one day last week.

Hezekiah Schaffer was hanged last week at Chambersburg, Pa., for the murder of his wife in February, 1878.

THE WEST.

Rice's "Evangeline" combination is at Haverly's Chicago Theater this week, where they give, in addition to the ever-welcome "Evangeline," "Pinafore" and "Conrad the Corsair." The public will never, apparently, tire of the absurdities and music in the burlesque and comic opera, and the Rice party are about the best in their line. Manager Haverly seems to hit the popular taste in everything he engages, and as a consequence crowded houses are the rule at his handsome theater.

Henry A. Schlencker, a printer from Illinois, who murdered Florence Booth last September, at Lincoln, Neb., has been refused a new trial, and will hang on the 13th of June....A telegram from Fort Buford, the nearest post to the British lines, says the Indians are becoming restless, and are beginning to move. The Yanktons are dissatisfied, and scarcely controllable.

A tornado swept over the town of Collinsville, Ill., one day last week, destroying several buildings, unroofing and partially wrecking numerous others, killing one person, injuring many more, and half frightening the entire population out of their wits.

The office of the Illinois State Treasurer at Springfield was robbed, a few days ago, of a package of $5,000, by two sneak-thieves, who entered the office ostensibly for the purpose of getting a $1,000 bill changed. The money was not missed until the sharpers had made good their escape.

Six hundred and ninety dozen eggs were served to the convicts in the penitentiary at Joliet, Ill., on Easter Sunday, in addition to their regular dinner.

A Kansas City (Mo.) dispatch says: "The total number of colored immigrants who have arrived in Wyandotte up to the present time is 1,771. Out of this number about 300 are in that city, dependent upon subscriptions for their subsistence. The sickness is increasing, and the committees are becoming tired and manifest less interest."

The jury in the Olive man-burning case at Hastings, Neb., returned a verdict of murder in the second degree against Olive and Fisher, and the Judge sentenced the prisoners to imprisonment for life at hard labor.

THE SOUTH.

At a delegate convention of colored men of Arkansas, held at Little Rock the other day, resolutions were adopted affirming that, "as the colored citizens of Arkansas in many localities are not allowed the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights, they are desirous of emigrating to some other State or Territory where the elective franchise can be enjoyed unmolested," and recommending the appointment of two colored Commissioners, under the National Emigration Aid Society, to select a suitable State or Territory.

The Texas Senate has adopted a measure taxing commercial travelers from other States $100 per year and $10 additional for each county visited on business.

A terrific tornado recently swept through the lower part of South Carolina, destroying hundreds of houses and killing many people. In the village of Walterboro more than 100 dwellings and all the churches were swept away. Three-fourths of the inhabitants are homeless. Fifteen persons were killed and many wounded. At Oakley, a station on the Northeastern railroad, all the negro houses were leveled and one negro killed, besides many hurt. Similar casualties are reported from various points in the track of the tornado.

Daniel Sheffer, a white man, shot and killed two negroes, Philip Burgett and his son Moses, near St. Genevieve, Mo., last week. There had been an old dispute between them, and they met and renewed the trouble, all being armed. Philip Burgett advanced upon Sheffer in a threatening manner, whereupon the latter shot him dead. Moses then opened fire on Sheffer, and was also shot and killed. Sheffer was arrested.

Secretary Sherman has issued his circular offering $150,000,000 of 4-per-cent. bonds at ½ of 1 per cent. above par. The circular, which gives the fullest of instructions as to means of obtaining these bonds, their time and place of payment, etc., invites "all banks, bankers, Postmasters and other public officers, and all other persons," to become the financial agents of the Government in placing the bonds.

Secretary Sherman's latest offer of $150,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds at one-half of 1 per cent. premium has been snapped up by a collection of New York money magnates....It has been decided by the Postoffice Department that advertising sheets made up in the form of newspapers cannot be mailed at newspaper rates.

POLITICAL.

A Washington telegram to the Chicago Inter Ocean says: "A gentleman traveling with Gen. Grant writes home that the General says he will not be a candidate for President under any circumstances."

The Republican State Central Committee of Iowa has issued a call for a State Convention at Des Moines on Wednesday, June 11, to nominate candidates for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Superintendent of Public Instruction, and Judge of the Supreme Court. The basis of representation is one delegate for each county, and, in addition thereto, one delegate for each 300 votes or fraction over 100 cast for Secretary of State last year. This will make a total of 772 delegates....The official returns of the recent State election in Michigan, though not complete, are sufficiently so as to make certain a Republican majority of about 4,000. The total vote so far received: Campbell, Republican, for Justice of the Supreme Court, 132,000; Shipman, coalition, 128,000.

The full official returns of the late election in Wisconsin show that Judge Cole, the Republican candidate for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, received a majority of 8,132 votes.

Mr. Rainey, colored ex-Congressman from South Carolina, who has been an applicant for the Third Auditorship of the Treasury, was tendered the position of Assistant Appointment Clerk of the Treasury by Secretary Sherman, and rejected it with great indignation.

GENERAL.

A conference of the railway trunk-line managers was held in New York last week. The principal reason for the meeting was an adjustment of the rates on live stock, on which there had been cutting for some time past from 60 to 35 cents a hundred. The conference resulted in the trunk lines fixing an arbitrary rate on live stock at 60 cents per 100 pounds, on a basis of Chicago to New York, the new schedule to go into effect immediately.

Letters from Keiff state that between the 8th and 11th inst. five attempts at murder were made against the officials there.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Army Appropriation bill was taken up in the Senate on the 11th, and Mr. Withers explained its provisions. No amendments were adopted, the Committee on Appropriations having agreed to resist all amendments, and the majority of the Senate seconding them accordingly. The reason assigned by Mr. Withers for such a course was that amendments would delay the passage of the bill. Mr. Hereford called up Mr. Hoar's resolution declaring the Democratic programme for the passage of appropriation bills to be unconstitutional and revolutionary, and made a speech against it, insisting that no such action was contemplated as would justify such a conclusion.——The House was at work on the Legislative Appropriation bill. Speaker Randall announced the standing committees, which are as follows:

Elections—Springer, Manning, Slemons, Speer, Colerick, Armfield, Beltzhoover, Sawyer, Phister, Keifer, Camp, Calkins, Field, Overton, Weaver.

The House was busy with the Legislative Appropriation bill on the 15th, the pending amendment being that increasing to $250,000 the appropriation for controlling and for eradicating contagious diseases among domestic animals. After a long debate the whole subject was stricken from the bill and the proposition agreed to recommending that the House refer the whole matter to the Committee on Agriculture, with instructions to report promptly. On motion of Mr. Haskell, the appropriation for investigating the habits of the cotton-worm and other injurious insects was placed under the control of the Entomological Commission. Mr. Bragg moved to strike out all provision for the Southern Claims Commission, and to insert a clause repealing the law creating the commission. Consideration of the amendment was postponed until the 16th.——The Senate held no session.——The Republican Senators had a caucus which lasted two hours. After a thorough discussion of the situation, during which nearly every Senator participated in the debate, the conclusion was reached that the Senators would unitedly urge an aggressive warfare against the political amendments to the Appropriation bill in the line marked out by ex-Secretary Robeson in his speech. The caucus unanimously agreed to disregard the position assumed by Gen. Garfield that the legislation could be accepted if presented as a separate measure. They held, on the contrary, that if the legislation on its merits could be acceptable it would not be revolutionary to pass it on an Appropriation bill. They decided rather that the proper constitutional ground to maintain was that outlined by ex-Secretary Robeson—that to repeal that section of the United States law binds the hands of the President of the United States, cripples the civil power, and prevents the Executive, or the courts, or the Marshals, or any civil posse, or any body of armed men in the execution of justice, to appear at the polls. This, the Republicans will maintain, is a violation of the constitution, and of the fundamental principles of civil liberty, and cannot be tolerated.

Debate on the Army Appropriation bill was opened in the Senate on the 14th. The pending question was on Mr. Blaine's amendment prohibiting the appearance within a mile of a polling-place of any person armed with a deadly weapon of any kind, and Mr. Blaine began the debate in a long speech, the first part of which was devoted to ridiculing the Democratic supposition of possible intimidation by the army at an election. In the entire South there were only 1,155 men—60 to each million of inhabitants. In some Southern States there were none at all. In North Carolina there were 30; in South Carolina, 120; in Georgia, 29; in Arkansas, 57; in Alabama, 32; in Louisiana, 231; and not one in Texas, outside of the border. Mr. Blaine concluded as follows: "I do not profess to know, Mr. President, what the President of the United States will do when these bills are presented to him, as I suppose in due course of time they will be. I certainly should never speak a solitary word of disrespect of the gentleman holding that exalted position, and I hope I shall not speak a word unbefitting the dignity of the office of Senator of the United States; but, as there has been speculation here and there on both sides as to what he would do, it seems to me that the dead heroes of the Union would rise from their graves if he should consent to be intimidated and outraged in his proper constitutional power by threats like these. All the war measures of Abraham Lincoln are to be wiped out, say leading Democrats. The Bourbons of France busied themselves, I believe, after the restoration in removing every trace of Napoleon's power and grandeur, even chiseling the "N" from public monuments raised to perpetuate his glory, but the dead man's hand from St. Helena reached out and destroyed them in their pride and in their glory. And I tell the Senators on the other side of this chamber, I tell the Democratic party North and South, South in the lead and North following, that this slow, unmoving finger of scorn from the tomb of the martyred President from the prairies of Illinois will wither and destroy them. "Though dead he speaketh." When you present these bills with these threats to a living President who bore the commission of Abraham Lincoln, and who served with honor in the army of the Union which Lincoln restored and preserved, I can think only of one appropriate response from his lips or his pen. He should say to you with all the scorn befitting his station: "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" Mr. Wallace, in reply to Mr. Blaine, said the bill makes no threat to deny supplies. Let us look at this subject of coercion. The President, Senate, and House are independent, each in its sphere. Each possesses a negative upon the other. The Senate and House each has an absolute veto upon the other, while that of the Executive is limited. If the Senate refuses to pass a House bill because of objectionable matter, and makes its removal a condition of its passage, it coerces the House to that extent. It has this right. It is not revolutionary. It exercises its constitutional right to judge of the measures. This right is vital; the check invaluable. The same is true of the Executive negative upon the Legislative power. If the Executive dissents, and, on reconsideration there are not two-thirds, the Legislative branch may decline to act. It has this right or it has no independence of action. It alone for itself must judge of the fitness, necessity, and constitutionality of the measure proposed. It cannot coerce the Executive, nor can the Executive coerce it. Each is responsible to the people for its conclusions and actions, and must act in full view of that tribunal. If the Legislative branch could be coerced to act in this mode, the will of the majority would be controlled by the minority. The patronage of an [illegible] President and minority could dictate legislation. No such purpose is intended by the constitutional negative.——In the House, Mr. Ladd, of Maine, attempted to introduce a financial bill, but Mr. Conger, of Michigan, and other Republicans objected, and caused so much discussion and delay in the proceedings that the morning hour expired before this or any other financial measure could be brought before the House.

Upon the assembling of the Senate on the 15th, the Secretary, before reading the journal, read a note from Vice President Wheeler, stating that [illegible] away from Washington, and it would be necessary for the Senate to elect a President pro tem. Mr. Bayard offered the following: "Resolved, That, in the absence of the Vice President, A. G. Thurman be and he is hereby chosen President of the Senate pro tem." Mr. Anthony moved to substitute the name of Thomas W. Ferry. Disagreed to—yeas, 18; nays, 25—and the resolution passed. Mr. Thurman was conducted to the chair by Mr. Ferry, the former remarking, on the way thither, "Turn about is fair play." Mr. Thurman, on taking the chair, said: "Senators, it is only necessary for me to say, in fewest possible words, that I sincerely thank you for this mark of your confidence." The Army Appropriation bill was taken up, and Mr. Logan addressed the Senate. He thought the question now before that body more important than any other that had arisen since 1861, when the same sentiments which prompted the present legislation were expressed by many of the same men who are now uttering them, and led to war. He denounced the proposed legislation as bad in itself, and as being attempted by unparliamentary practices. Mr. Beck followed Mr. Logan. He said the Democracy was warned of an appeal to Cæsar. They intend to appeal to the people before Cæsar comes, before the Rubicon is crossed, and the cry is, "Alea jacta est." It is to prevent Cæsar from coming that they desire the soldiers to be taken from the polls. As to the small number of troops east of Omaha, spoken of by the gentleman from Maine (Blaine), Mr. Beck said when it was determined that Louisiana should be carried by force, 4,500 men were sent there. It was easy to concentrate troops when necessary for such a purpose. When this law was passed there were no John Davenports and such people to take command of the army.——The House passed the Senate bill for the construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes. Mr. Chalmers, of Mississippi, arose to a personal explanation, and caused to be read extracts from newspapers reciting the old charges of cruelty and massacre of colored people at the battle of Fort Pillow, and connecting him (Chalmers) with the same. Mr. Chalmers asked for the appointment of a special committee of seven, a majority of which shall be composed of Republicans, to investigate the truth of the statements made. The resolution was, on the suggestion of Gen. Garfield, postponed for the present. The House then went into committee of the whole on the Legislative bill, the pending question being on Mr. Bragg's motion to insert a clause repealing the law creating the Southern Claims Commission. After considerable debate the amendment was defeated—yeas, 65; nays, 113. A bill was offered by Mr. De La Matyr providing for the substitution of United States legal-tender paper money for national-bank notes.

Mr. Beck concluded his remarks on the Appropriation bill on the 16th. He read the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Hoar denouncing the alleged Democratic programme as unconstitutional and revolutionary, and then said the Democrats were not proposing either to coerce the President or to prevent the President from coercing them. Nor were they setting up revolutionary measures or endeavoring to pass acts which would deprive the President from using the army for constitutional purposes. All they proposed to do, as would be seen by the sixth section of the bill, was to say to the President he should not recall the troops from the frontier, or where they were placed to prevent an invasion from abroad, to be used merely for political purposes. Mr. Beck retorted upon the Republicans the charge of revolutionary action by referring to the law of '68, which, he said, was so framed that acts of Congress declared by any Circuit Court of the United States null and void were sustained unless two-thirds of the Judges of the Supreme Court should agree in pronouncing them unconstitutional. He also referred to the manner in which the Thirteenth amendment, abolishing slavery, was ratified, as affording another example of Republican revolution. He quoted numerous precedents to show that it was not unusual to attach legislation on general appropriation bills. Among them it was seen that the law relating to Supervisors and Deputy Marshals was enacted on an Appropriation bill by a Republican Congress, and that the celebrated Drake amendment, which annulled the decisions of the Supreme Court, was made part of an appropriation bill. Mr. Dawes next addressed the Senate. He referred to the dangerous theory of State's rights which could be seen underlying these attempts to deprive the General Government of the right given it by the constitution to regulate the elections for Representatives. He denounced that theory, and upheld the idea that we are a nation, not a confederation of States. Mr. Dawes said his friends on the other side ought not to prate about purity of the ballot-box until it was forgotten how 16,000 Republican votes in the State of New York were wiped out in 1868, in accordance with a circular sent out before-hand in the name of their chief, S. J. Tilden, who afterward did not know anything about it, just as he does not know anything about every other political iniquity that has been transacted in his name and in his house. He supposed it was only a question of time when the threat to wipe out all the war measures, and restore the old order of things, would be fulfilled; but he had felt called upon to raise his protest as a representative of a State whose people would always be found in the van of any movement necessary for the defense of true republican principles.——The House completed the money parts of the Legislative bill, and entered upon the political discussion. Mr. Lewis opened the debate with a legal argument against the Election laws. He denied that the South was solid for any illegal or unconstitutional purpose, or out of antagonism to the North. The Southern people needed help and sympathy too much for that.

The Senate continued the discussion of the Army bill on the 17th. Mr. Voorhees said the protection of the ballot-box had been wrested from the proper local officers, and given to corrupt Federal officials. The spirit that dictated this law was distrust of the people and their capacity for self-government under free elections. The whole power of the constitution was thus perverted. The people would resent this insulting tyranny when the facts should be clearly presented to them, and a righteous sense of resistance would spring up in their breasts. He hoped the people would read this law until it should become an abhorrence to the public mind. There was no American who was not liable to arrest for no other reason than that existing in the mind of a Supervisor or Deputy Marshal, thus placing every person's liberty at the mercy of party malice or hate. Every ruffian acting in such capacity was to determine a man's rights at the polls. Mr. Voorhees said that it was a satire on free government to say that suffrage should be exercised at the point of the bayonet. Mr. Teller followed Mr. Voorhees. He said the Democratic cry seemed to be for free ballot. All the frauds on the ballot for the last thirty years, he said, emanated with, or had been to the advantage of, the Democratic party. He cited the frauds in Kansas in 1853 and 1854, in Louisiana in 1861, and in New York city in 1868. He did not desire to misrepresent the South, but would only state the facts in regard to that section which, in his opinion, made Federal supervision necessary to a fair election. He then reviewed at a considerable length the testimony taken before the committee of which he was Chairman, and declared that even white Democrats in good standing testified to lawlessness and intimidation at the elections to prevent colored people from voting as they desired in Louisiana and South Carolina.——Debate was also continued in the House on the political amendments to the Legislative Appropriation bill. Mr. Kelley spoke first. While disclaiming partisanship and deprecating inflammatory speeches, he warned the Democrats that if they adjourned because of a veto, and permitted our light-houses to go out on our coasts, and neglected to enact necessary measures, they would make the North as solid as it was from 1861 to 1865. He said, too, that the South would not be solid in the event of a violation of the constitution, and that the two Greenbackers from the South, which prevented it from being solid now, were only the forerunners of the break in the solid South which would result from the execution of the present Democratic programme. Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, made a strong legal argument for the Democratic side in favor of the constitutionality of the Democratic position, and in conclusion said: Disclaiming any intention to make appeals to passion; disclaiming any intention to excite partisan feelings or to distract the judgment of people's representatives on this very exciting question, I say to the gentleman on the other side, not in any spirit of arrogance, but with all the deliberation and earnestness which the gravity that this great subject demands, that these laws must be repealed, and that this power of the Executive to control the election of the people's representatives must be taken away.

A Woman 104 Years Old.

The venerable being is Mrs. Nulton, of Kittanning, Pa. She resides with a widowed daughter. From her own lips the reporter of the Oil City Derrick learned that she was born in Philadelphia on the 14th day of June, 1775. The old lady, taking her venerable age into account, is in a remarkably fine state of physical preservation. She can read without the aid of glasses, and readily recognizes acquaintances passing along the opposite side of the street. With the aid of a walking stick she walks around the premises with the leisurely ease and grace of a damsel of 75 summers. Her memory for a person of her extraordinary age is exceptionally retentive. Events of a half century ago are to her as the happening of yesterday. She is the mother of a family of seven children. The Judge died several months since at the ripe age of 70 years, of, it might be said, the infirmities of old age. The daughter with whom she resides is herself an active matron of 68 years, while her youngest hopeful is a roystering baby boy of 54. The combined living representatives of her flesh and blood, were it possible to bring them together in convention, would make an overwhelming family. She has grandchildren who are almost tottering with age, and great-great-grandchildren without number have cast their maiden vote. The old lady is very glad to receive company, cordially inviting all who call to come again.

Keats.

Keats, though one of the most ideal of poets, proved himself, for once at least, practically ingenious. He lived at Rome, in the same house with his friend Severn, and the two had their meals sent to them from a neighboring cook-shop. The food was horribly bad. "Day after day," said Mr. Severn, "we had to send it down again, and very often the second dinner they sent up was worse than the first. One day Keats said to me, 'I have a plan to make that fellow give us a good dinner to-day, Severn; I promise you we will have a good dinner.' Well, presently up came the waiter with his pile of dishes, and deposited them on the table. Keats took off the covers, and inspected the meats with grave disgust; then, without a word, flung open the window and majestically pitched the contents of every dish into the plaza below. The awe-struck waiter gathered up his dishes, retired precipitately, and came back presently with the best dinner we had yet eaten in Rome."

Empress Elizabeth and Queen Victoria.

The London correspondent of Figaro accounts for the failure of the Empress Elizabeth of Austria to visit the Queen at Windsor on her return from her fox-hunting expedition to Ireland. Whether true or not, the story is at least interesting. A year ago when the Empress' visit to London drew near its close, she went to Windsor one wintry Sunday to make a farewell call on Queen Victoria. According to etiquette of the Court, the hour of her arrival and departure had been announced beforehand. One of the royal carriages awaited her at the station and took her up to the castle through a driving snowstorm. The visit over, the Empress took her departure at the prescribed time, and was not asked to remain, although the storm had increased in fury. Such an invitation would have been only an act of common politeness for common people, but it would have violated the canons of court etiquette. On the way back to the station one of the horses slipped and fell, causing a delay of some minutes, during which the sharp whistle of the train reached the ears of the Empress. The station was reached a few seconds too late. In any other class of society the disagreeable situation would have been remedied by the return of the traveler to her hostess, but etiquette forbade counting on the royal hospitality under such circumstances. So the Empress remained at the station, warming her feet at the fire in the stationmaster's little parlor, and satisfying her hunger with a share of the family dinner of roast beef and Yorkshire pudding. The Empress Elizabeth is not a woman to be annoyed by such trifling accidents as missing a train and being thrown on the hospitality of a poor railroad official, but she preserves a little feeling of spite against Queen Victoria for not sending the carriage back to take her to the castle when she learned of the affair, and for never troubling herself to inquire about the end of the adventure. It is said that her Imperial Majesty has made a vow never to set her foot in Windsor Castle again, and that she declined an invitation to the wedding of the Duke of Connaught in terms too curt to be courteous.

The Flirt at the Theater.

She sat in the front row of the parquette-circle the other night, and, when she wasn't flirting with the gentlemen whose faces she could see, she was discussing the people on the stage. She was a beautiful blonde, with dark-brown eyes, and her face attracted much attention. A fair, white skin; rosy, dimpled cheeks; lips like the cherries that grow nearest the sun, in the top of the tree; pearly teeth, the regular rows of which showed themselves whenever she chose to let her musical laugh be heard (which was often); and a pretty-shaped head, crowned with a wealth of golden hair and the cunningest of hats. She talked aloud, and even made up faces at the gentleman who stared at her. Ordinarily such a character, even though a female beauty, would have been unpleasant at the theater, but somehow everybody seemed pleased with the lady. If T. G.'s glass did not deceive him, she was about 4 years old. The only portion of the play she seemed to understand and appreciate was a love-making scene.

When the laughter that followed the exit of the lovers in the play had subsided, the little one turned to a young lady and said in a perfectly-audible voice:

"Della, 'at's dess 'e way Cousin Deorge tissed oo 'e uver day."

The star was much disconcerted to hear a roar of laughter from a portion of the audience just as she made her tragic entrance on the next scene; but the tribulation was insignificant by comparison with that of a certain couple, who will henceforth leave the "little flirt" at home when they go to the play.—Detroit Free Press.

FARM NOTES.

WATERING HORSES.—Horses should drink after, rather than before, eating, as a rule, though there are exceptions. A very thirsty horse may have a little water, though not all he desires, especially if heated.

SHEEP PULLING WOOL.—Sheep pull each other's wool when they are suffering from indigestion and a depraved appetite. When this is noticed, it would be well to give a strong dose of salt, which will act as a purgative, or one ounce of an equal mixture of salt and Epsom salts may be given to each sheep separately, lest some get too much.

LOST CUD.—Suspended rumination, commonly called lost cud, is the effect of indigestion. This is frequently removed by giving the cow one pint of raw linseed oil, or melted lard. A very popular remedy is to cause the cow to swallow a salt mackerel; this is often effective, and operates doubtless by the action of the salt and the oil in the mackerel.

TO PREVENT A COW LEAKING MILK.—To use an elastic band around a leaky teat will be injurious. The compression will soon cause mischief. Any other mechanical contrivance will doubtless have the same effect. A safe practice is to procure some collodion at the druggist's, and as soon as the milking is over, to cover the end of the teat with a film of it. This dries instantly, and shrinks in drying, thus closing the orifice so gently as not to be hurtful, and will break away in milking.

RED ANTS are often a great pest in a house, and it is difficult to get rid of them. A friend says that they may be readily trapped thus: Ants are fond of fresh lard, and if a plate be greased with that they will leave almost everything else and go for it; in their greediness they get caught in the lard and cannot get away. The plate is to be occasionally warmed and wiped, and then regreased and set again. It is well to place some small sticks against the edge of the plate to serve the ants as bridges and ladders by which to reach the lard.

SOD VS. STUBBLE FOR CORN.—A subscriber, in Fellow county, Ind., planted eighteen acres of corn last year; half on a clover sod, the other half on "the best side of the field, in corn the year previous;" all planted the same day and having the same treatment throughout. The result was thirteen bushels per acre on the corn-stubble, and fifty bushels on the sod land. Although the stubble had some manure, it is very evident that the clover added vastly more fertility to the soil, and was the cause of the larger crop. It is a common experience that a clover sod is one of the best manures for any kind of grain crop, and it is highly valued by most wheat-growers in all sections.

CHOICE OF HENS.—The sitters should be chosen of a breed characterized by persistence and regularity in incubation, fidelity to their chickens, and gentleness of disposition. The Light Brahmas are our resource, and can not be excelled for hatching and rearing. Pure bloods, however, are not used; but, to give less awkwardness and greater spread of wings, they are crossed with barn-yard fowls. The half-blood resemble the Brahmas the most in form and other characteristics, and are almost uniformly docile. The half-blood Brahmas are extremely valuable for hatching and taking care of chickens. If, however, it is more convenient to use some variety of pure-blooded fowls for incubating purposes, the Plymouth Rocks, or either variety of the Cochins or Brahmas will do very well. If the stock of eggs be more than ordinarily valuable, we prefer hens in their second and third year. They are better mothers when the younglings most need a mother's care; they are always more steady and constant after being nested, and they will bring up their chicks, on the average, with considerably greater certainty than will yearlings and pullets. —Poultry World.

DISTANCE APART FOR DRAINS.—When the conditions are such that a sufficient fall or depth cannot be had otherwise, the outlet may be under the surface of the water a portion of the year and the drains still work well, especially if the outlet is into a running stream. The question of distance between drains is a more general one, even, than the last. The custom of the English drainers is, to put their drains deeper and closer to each other than the American. It is quite natural there should be this difference in most cases, for, as a rule, our soil, especially in the West, is of a freer and more pliable nature, possessing the property of permeability to water to a much greater extent than the clay soils of England. I find many rules for our guidance, but believe we must fall back upon practice. A common rule is twenty feet apart for a three-foot drain, forty feet for a four-foot one, and eighty feet for a five-foot one. A granger writes to the Prairie Farmer, under date March 23, 1878: "The experience has proved in most cases that 150 feet apart is near enough except when the ground is naturally spongy or marshy." As a note to the communication the editor suggests that ten feet in width may be allowed for each foot in depth. My own opinion is: Tile drains may be put as near to each other as we please, and that they will do good service in the usual soil of Illinois as far apart as proposed by the granger. —Prof. Shattuck, in Drainage Journal.

When Did the Tomato Arrive?

Noticing an article in your paper containing an account of the first eating of the tomato in this country, I desire to correct your correspondent, "Seaweed." In 1793, and several years subsequently, Capt. Phineas Eldridge resided on Carpenter street, west of Fourth street, Philadelphia. During 1798, a Frenchman named Nicalo left San Domingo with his family, consisting of wife and two children, and occupied the adjoining property. He brought with him several varieties of vegetable seed, which were planted, and after a lapse of time grew and bore fruit. Among them was a tomato, which he dressed as a salad, and which was relished by Mr. Eldridge's family. The neighbors procured the seed and raised them as an ornament, having the impression that they were poisonous. Tomatoes were used in New Orleans as an article of food in 1812; they were sold in Philadelphia markets as early as 1829. —Boston Transcript.

ARTISTIC COOKING.

(From the Philadelphia Times.)

At Association Hall Miss Dods appeared as usual among her pots and pans and gas stoves, dressed in black alpaca, and white pinafore and white cuffs. She prepared and cooked several dishes, explaining the processes as she worked, talking very slowly, giving ample time for her listeners to make full notes; while some of her dishes were cooking she took up another, going back and finishing the first when the proper time came. In this way she utilized all the time and prevented unpleasant waits. One of her dishes was beef olives, requiring one pound of steak from the round, a little pepper and salt, one-half ounce clarified fat, one-half pint cold water, one desert-spoonful Worcester sauce, one desert-spoonful mushroom catchup, one-half ounce flour, one desert-spoonful chopped parsley, three table-spoonfuls bread-crumbs and one egg. While preparing this she said: I first melt in a small saucepan the clarified fat, and then put in a small basin three table-spoonfuls of bread-crumbs, pepper and salt. I next chop the parsley very fine and mix it with the bread crumbs, pepper and salt it in the basin; then I drop into this an egg and mix it well in with the ingredients in the basin. I cut the steak into small, long pieces. Into each of these pieces I roll a little of the stuffing and tie around them a piece of string. When the fat in the pan is very hot I brown the roll of meat on all sides. When they are browned I pour away the fat. A steak or olive browns better with the lid of the pan off. When the olives are done I remove the strings and pour over the sauce, which I will show you how I make: In a small basin I put a half-ounce of flour, and make smooth with a very little cold water. When it is quite smooth I add the catchup, the Worcester sauce, and a few drops of browning, the latter to give it a nice color. I then add the rest of the half-pint of water and mix well. The olives have now browned nicely. I pour off the fat and pour on the gravy, cold. I stir this on the fire until it boils, and then let it cook slowly for an hour and a half. In using mushroom catchup be careful not to use too much salt.

MOCK-TURTLE SOUP.

For mock-turtle soup I require one calf's head, five ounces of flour, five quarts of cold water, one teaspoonful of mixed spice, two onions, one gill of sherry, plenty of pepper and salt, five ounces of butter, one table-spoonful of mushroom catchup or Worcestershire sauce, two raw eggs and one sliced lemon. Soak the head in plenty of water for one hour. Then put it on the fire in five quarts of cold water. When it boils, skim it very carefully, and then let it boil until the tongue will come out and the meat will slip from the bones. Take out the tongue and the meat from the cheeks, put the rest back, and, adding the onions, let it boil four hours. Add a table-spoonful of mixed spice, strain and let it get cold, and then remove from the top of the stock all the fat. Melt in a large, clean saucepan five ounces of butter, stir in five ounces of flour, and add the stock, into which you have already thrown the tongue and meat from the cheeks, cut into small squares. Then take the rest of the meat from the other parts of the head and add to it two raw eggs, plenty of pepper and salt, mix well together and roll the mixture in small balls, using a little dry flour for the purpose. Place the balls on a slightly greased plate, and stand them in the oven three minutes to make them firm. Then put in a tureen a very-thinly-sliced lemon, one gill of sherry, one table-spoonful of catchup or Worcestershire sauce, and the small balls, and over these pour the soup after it has boiled ten minutes, having added a few drops of browning to the soup at the last minute. The soup should stand in the tureen five minutes before it is served, so that the center of the small balls may be thoroughly heated.

CHICKEN SALAD (MAYONCAISE SAUCE).

To make Mayoncaise sauce I require the yelks of two eggs, one gill of salad oil and a little pepper and salt. First see that your bowl and spoon are quite dry. Drop into the bowl the yelks of two eggs, and add, drop by drop, a gill of salad oil, beating the eggs all the time. When the yelks and oil are thoroughly mixed and perfectly smooth, add a teaspoonful of vinegar, a little at a time, and a little pepper and salt. To make chicken salad, boil the fowl until it is tender, remove all the bone and skin, and cut the meat into rough pieces, not too small. Sprinkle over all a little pepper and salt. Take one-third of a head of celery, cut it into very thin slices and mix it well with the chicken, and sprinkle over it half a table-spoonful of vinegar. Then place it on a plate and pour over it the Mayoncaise sauce. Then sprinkle over it a table-spoonful of capers. Arrange around this the very delicate leaves of a head of lettuce, and arrange around the plate, inside of the lettuce and on the salad, a few gerkins. Garnish the center with the green tips of the celery.

RICE CROQUETTES.

I require for rice croquettes one-half pound of Carolina rice, two eggs, two ounces of sugar, one quart of milk, one teaspoonful essence of vanilla, and two or three table-spoonfuls of bread crumb. First put the rice and milk together and boil twenty minutes; then turn the rice into a large basin or bowl, add the yelks of two eggs, one ounce of sugar and a teaspoonful of essence of vanilla. Beat this well together and put aside for one hour to get cold; at the end of an hour, to finish the croquettes, first flour the hands slightly and roll the mixture into small balls, taking about a table-spoonful at a time. Don't let the flour get inside the croquettes, as it will make them break in cooking; then beat up well the whites of the two eggs and roll well in this the croquettes, seeing that they are thoroughly covered. Roll in the bread crumbs, shaking all except enough to cover them, and fry for two minutes in clarified fat.

THE HOME DOCTOR.

TO REMOVE A WART.—A wart can be removed by applying a small quantity of nitric acid to the surface. Do not cut or open the wart in anyway, but simply touch it with the cork. Should it pain when first applied, dip in cold water, and it will be immediately relieved.

RELIEF FOR INDIGESTION.—After a long illness, when the appetite first returns, solid food is apt to bring on indigestion, accompanied by violent pain. The only relief I have found for this is to use half a teaspoonful of carbonate of soda, dissolved in half a goblet of water, and a teaspoonful of essence of peppermint, taking a wineglassful every ten minutes till relieved.

HOW TO CURE SWELLED FEET AND ANKLES.—Take plantain leaves—the common weed that is found on every roadside and in almost any grass plot—wilt them by putting separately between the hands; cover the swollen parts with them, and keep in place by wrapping the limb with rags or a towel on going to bed at night, or keep them on during the day, if not obliged to be upon the feet.

COFFEE AND EGG FOR SICK PERSONS.—I have found that a sick person, wanting nourishment and having lost appetite, could often be sustained by the following, when nothing else would be taken: Make a strong cup of coffee, adding boiling milk as usual, only sweetening rather more; take an egg, beat white and yelk together thoroughly; boil the coffee, milk and sugar together, and pour it over the beaten egg in the cup you are going to serve it in. This simple recipe I have used frequently in hospital practice.

COLD FEET.—Good health is never attainable if the feet are habitually cold, since this implies an impaired circulation of the blood; that it does not reach the extremities. Instead of "toasting them in the oven," soak them in warm water till thoroughly warm, and then dash cool or cold water over them, rubbing them thoroughly with a crash towel, till a reaction occurs; using the flesh-brush freely. This, followed for a few nights, will generally warm the feet, by improving the circulation of the blood. The brush, used on the whole body, is not only safe—safer than the cold bath, at least for the weakly—but will aid in equalizing the circulation. Let the feet, also, be put in the warm rays of the sun; the clothing warmed and thoroughly sunned. This will do much to improve the cold and sweaty feet, and can do no possible harm. Keep the feet clean, which can be done only by frequent washing.

CURE FOR BURNS.—A venerable patient, a retired foundryman, tells the editor of the Louisville Medical News that during his apprenticehood to a shipbuilder of Philadelphia he became acquainted with a never-failing remedy for burns and scalds, and that in his subsequent foundry life he saw innumerable such injuries relieved of pain and healed as if by magic by powdered charcoal. The softer it is, the better, and that from pine wood is the best. It is to be thickly spread over the burned or scalded surface as soon as possible, and renewed as it becomes moist or drops off. The same patient states that in the ship-yard and in his foundry fir balsam proved a most soothing and rapidly-curative dressing for abrasions and cuts. The hurts heals with marvelous expedition, and suppuration, erysipelas, etc., are always prevented, he says. The balsam should be spread thickly over the wound. No doubt the disciples of antiseptic surgery would attribute the good results of this dressing to the disinfectant power of the balsam, but the secret of its efficacy lies, no doubt, in its exclusion of the atmosphere from the wound. Nature endeavors to keep out the air from the wounds by means of a film of lymph or pus or a scab, and meddlesome men thwart nature by frequently "cleansing" by water, or, worse still, soap and water. The balm protects the sore from air and water, and nature, unobstructed, does her healing work rapidly and well.

The Heart-Broken Merchant.

The shrewdness and business capacity that have made the Yankee the first of traders, and promise to turn this country into the workshop of the world, received a striking and happy illustration the other day. The scene was hereabouts; the characters, a rising young merchant and a pretty woman. He had an affection for her, she a liking for him, so they betrothed. After a time she found out that she didn't love him well enough to marry him, and the match was broken off. It was a severe blow, and he staggered under it; but he fought well for himself, protested that his life was ruined, asked if she could not learn to love him, and in all ways did the proper thing. She was immovable, however, and he sadly and reluctantly took his leave. While his eyes were full of gathering tears, he bade his faltering farewells, then closed the door upon his hopes. A moment later he opened it, stepped back into the room, and, with tears in his voice, brokenly murmured: "I hope this will make no difference about your coming to the store, Miss ——; and that your mother will continue to trade with us. I shall be happy to give the usual discount. Our stock is large and varied, our aim to please." And the door shut, finally, leaving him alone with his grief. —"Yorick," in Portland Press.

A FREE BALLOT.

Speech of Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky.

Delivered in the National House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Ohio, in that effective and able speech to which he treated this House a few days ago, used the following language, which I read from the Record:

"In opening this debate, I challenge all comers to show a single instance in our history where this consent has been coerced."

What consent? The consent of the Executive to extraneous matter injected into appropriation bills.

"This is the great, the paramount issue, which dwarfs all others into insignificance."

I accept the gage of battle that the gentleman throws down. I read from the records and show him the instance he seeks. I find that on the 2d day of March, 1867, a thing occurred in this House of which the gentleman should have been cognizant, for he was then as now an honored member on this floor. I find the following message was sent by the then President of the United States to the House of Representatives:

"To the House of Representatives:

"The act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the army.'"

Ah, by singular coincidence, that, too, was an army bill, just as this is:

"The act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes,' contains provisions to which I must call attention. Those provisions are contained in the second section, which in certain cases virtually deprives the President of his constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in the sixth section, which denies to ten States of this Union their constitutional right to protect themselves in any emergency by means of their own militia. These provisions are out of place in an appropriation act."

Did the gentleman from Ohio borrow his recently-used protest from this official protest of the Executive of the country?

"These provisions are out of place in an appropriation act. I am compelled to defeat these necessary appropriations if I withhold my signature to the act. Pressed by these considerations—"

I grant you, he does not say "coerced."

"Pressed by these considerations, I feel constrained to return the bill with my signature, but to accompany it with my protest against the sections which I have indicated.

"ANDREW JOHNSON.

"MARCH 2, 1867."

Is there no coercion there? Why, sir, the record is full. In an act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of this Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, it was provided that in the courts of the United States there should be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, or in any other civil action because he is a party interested in the issue to be tried. Is not that extraneous matter? Yet upon this bill the record shows that the gentleman from Ohio is found voting in the list of ayes.

But, sir, worse than all this, I find that on a memorable occasion in the Thirty-ninth Congress, of which the gentleman from Ohio was likewise a member, that occurred which will never fade from the minds of the American people. I refer to the proceedings looking to the impeachment of the Chief Executive of this republic, which came so nigh resulting in conviction. On that occasion I find that a colleague of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Ashley, moved to suspend the rules to allow him to make a report from the committee on what? Judiciary? No, sir. From the Committee on Territories, in the nature of a resolution impeaching the President of the American Government for high crimes and misdemeanors. On the yea-and-nay vote I find the gentleman from Ohio voted "aye."

And I find further, sir, the counts upon which these impeachment articles were predicated, and I beg to call the attention of this committee to them. Mr. Ashley said:

"I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

"I charge him with usurpation of power and violation of law."

And now come the five counts in the indictment, and I beg the careful attention of this committee, for I will bring it home to the very issue that the gentleman from Ohio has courted in this contest:

"In that he has corruptly used the appointing power."

I put the gentleman on his candor and submit to him to say whether he ever intended to impeach the President for that. The country knows he did not. That appointing power had not been wielded in such a way as to merit the censure of the gentleman himself.

"Secondly, in that he has corruptly used the pardoning power."

Did the gentleman from Ohio mean to impeach him for that? I will answer for him, no. Everybody knows he did not.

"Thirdly, in that he has corruptly used the veto power."

And there was where the sting came in. It was the exercise of that constitutional prerogative; it was the employment of the veto power, for which the House and the gentleman from Ohio voted these articles of impeachment, coupled with one other offense only.

"Fourthly, in that he has corruptly disposed of the public property of the United States."

That was a mere formal count in the indictment, and I doubt not that the gentleman from Ohio will admit it.

"Fifthly, in that he has corruptly interfered—" In what?

"In the elections, and did acts which, in contemplation of the constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors."

There were but two counts in that indictment upon which it was proposed to impeach the Executive; it was the exercise of the veto power and it was his interference, not in elections, but his interference to prevent the interference of the armed power of this Government in the elections of this country. Was the denunciation still ringing in that gentleman's ears which the then President had employed in his interview with Gen. Emory, denouncing as subversive of all the principles of free government the interference of the military with the right of suffrage at the polls?

But, Mr. Chairman, these counts in this indictment were voted on more than once. The gentleman from Ohio is recorded every time as voting in their favor. And may I be permitted to remind this committee that the record of that Congress shows that he was supported in his action, that he had standing by him, voting side by side with him to impeach the President for the legitimate exercise of the veto power, one who was then comparatively obscure, and who, but for a combination of accidents, would have remained to this day and until his dying day in that obscurity for which nature and his Creator seemed so designedly to have fitted him—that side by side with the gentleman from Ohio stood and voted with him Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes, with whose prospective veto we are threatened. Now, sir, I beg you to tell me by what rule of consistency does the gentleman from Ohio come upon this floor to flaunt in the face of an American Congress an anticipated exercise by this Executive of his veto when he and that Executive both stand committed upon the record to his impeachment if he dares to employ it?

And while I am at this point I might ask by what sort of authority either that gentleman or any other comes upon this floor to threaten us with the probable or possible action of that Executive at all. What provision of the Federal constitution, what law enacted by any preceding Congress undertakes to clothe anybody, either that President himself or one of his privy council, even including his Premier, his Secretary of State, to sit as he did on the floor of this Chamber on Saturday of last week and by his presence and his indications of approval seek to intimidate, overawe, and browbeat an American Congress? Who commissioned the gentleman from Ohio to tell us that we had best be careful because the issue was made and the Executive would not be coerced into a message of approval?

I would ask, does the gentleman from Ohio, or does any other gentleman, put so low an estimate upon the self-respect, the integrity, the courage and the manhood of this House, without regard to party, as to believe that such a threat so flaunted is to intimidate the law-making branch of this Government to shape its action on measures of legislation? I cannot think that we are measured by so short a standard.

But, sir, I am not through with the speech which the gentleman has made. He tells us:

"The proposition now is, that after fourteen years have passed, and not one petition from one American citizen has come to us asking that this law be repealed; while not one memorial has found its way to our desks complaining of the law, so far as I have heard, the Democratic House of Representatives now holds that if they are not permitted to force upon another House and upon the Executive against their consent the repeal of a law that Democrats made, this refusal shall be considered a sufficient ground for starving this Government to death. That is the proposition which we denounce as revolution."

And that was received with applause on the Republican side.

Does the gentleman from Ohio mean to stand upon that declaration? By that significant nod he says that he does. Does he not know that the Congress just expired bore upon its files petition after petition, memorial after memorial, in contested-election cases, sent by the House to its committee, protesting against the presence of the military at the polls and denouncing the usurpation, demanding its repeal, in order that a free ballot might be had? Does the gentleman fail to remember that the State of Louisiana—a sovereign State of this confederacy once more, thank God—sent her memorial to these halls, in which in thunder tones she uttered her anathemas against the very practice which this amendment seeks to correct?

But that gentleman did more; he went further and, if possible, he did worse. I mean to deal in exact fairness. I even mean to be liberal in the construction I put upon his utterances.

Mr. Chairman, it is generally true that the grave suffices to silence the tongue of detraction. It is not often that its darkened portals are invaded to pronounce severe criticism, even though richly deserved, if it is to be pronounced upon the dead. But the gentleman from Ohio, forgetting himself in his speech on last Saturday, forgot also to observe this manly and magnanimous rule. By that speech he certainly must have sought, or, if not seeking, he was unfortunate in producing the impression that a distinguished dead Senator from the State of Kentucky had introduced into the Federal Senate Chamber the bill which we, by this amendment, seek to repeal, and to send his name down to posterity to be blasted by the act, if indeed he had performed it, and that charge to rest upon that gentleman's own high authority. I hold in my hand the very bill, No. 37, which was introduced upon the 5th of January, 1864, by Senator Powell, of Kentucky. There lies before me, on my desk, the manly, statesmanlike and patriotic, bold utterances that he delivered in the shape of a speech upon the consideration of that bill. I challenge the gentleman to find within the limits of this measure a single, solitary provision, line, sentence, word or syllable that this amendment seeks to repeal.

Does not the gentleman know—if he does not, it is his fault—that the amendment incorporated upon this bill which we now seek to repeal was incorporated and ingrafted upon it, not when the Senate was in committee of the whole, but in open Senate, upon motion of Senator Pomeroy, and, when the vote was taken upon that amendment by yeas and nays, every solitary Democrat in that chamber voted against it and put the seal of his condemnation upon it, Mr. Powell among the number? Here stands Senator Powell's utterance, in which he explains how and why it was that the Democratic members in that body and this body at last accepted this as the best that could be had; notwithstanding, against their protest, the ingrafting of the Pomeroy amendment, because it was to be taken in lieu of what they charged was true, of what the President of the United States in an official communication to Congress had declared to be true, that in the absence of even the limitations that amended bill would give, the military authorities and officers of the Government had arrogated to themselves the power in all the lately seceding States of declaring what should be the qualification of voters and what should be the qualification to hold office. It was as the least offensive of two offensive alternatives. It was not candid, it was not fair; the record rebukes the gentleman for seeking to place a dead statesman in such a false position.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is useless to follow these things further. It is not, sir, for me to waste the time and trench upon the patience of this committee by following out the tergiversations through which the Republican party has wound itself to this high plane of protest against revolutionary legislation. Why, sir, the gentleman from Ohio in 1872, made a speech upon this floor which he will not deny. It was, as is always the case with his efforts, an adroit as well as an able speech. In that he declared that the minority to which we then belonged, but in which in God's providence we are no longer found—he declared that the minority were guilty of revolution. For what? Because they said that extraneous matter should not be put upon appropriation bills. He said that was revolution. We took him at his word, and now where does he stand? It was revolution then to resist the injection of extraneous matter over the protest of the majority. It is revolution now for the majority to resist that same protest of that majority; but in the one case it was his side protesting, in the other case it was ours.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, let one take the darkened pages of his country's history for the last seventeen long years and read it carefully, and tell me then whether it lies in the mouth of that worthy leader of a once-great but waning party to read lectures to anybody, either upon the score of revolutionary legislation or of extraneous introductions into appropriation bills. Better far in the face of the record that they have made, better to listen patiently to the confirmed inebriate as he dilates upon the virtues of temperance, better let the queen of the demi-monde elaborate the beauties of female virtue, or let the devil prate of the scheme of universal redemption, than for homilies upon good morals and lectures upon revolutionary legislation to be delivered from such a source.

There is but one issue here, and I insist that neither this House nor the people of this country shall be allowed to wander from it. It is but this, and nothing more: whether the military power shall be allowed at your polls; whether the elections shall be guarded by the mailed hand of military power; whether the ballot-box, that last and safest shield of the freeman's liberties, shall be turned over to the tender mercies of the armies of your land. Or, to state it yet more tersely and probably more fairly, it is simply whether the spirit and the genius of this Government shall be reversed, and whether the civil shall be made subordinate to the military power.

Why, sir, among the most favored, the most cherished and precious principles ingrafted on our system of government from our old prototype, the English people, is that provision which would not tolerate not only the interference but the presence of the military at the polls.

Over 100 years ago an English statute declared the will of Englishmen upon this vital question.

I read the statute:

"Be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That when and as often as any election of any peer or peers to represent the peers of Scotland in Parliament, or any members to serve in Parliament, shall be appointed to be made, the Secretary at War for the time being, or, in case there shall be no Secretary at War, then such person who shall officiate in the place of the Secretary at War, shall, and is hereby required, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, to issue and send forth proper orders, in writing, for the removal of every such regiment, troop or company, or other number of soldiers as shall be quartered or billeted in any such city, borough, town or place, one day at the least before the day appointed for such election, to the distance of two or more miles from such city, borough, town or place, as aforesaid, until one day at the least after the poll to be taken at such election shall be ended and the poll-books closed.—Statute George II."

From that time till now I do declare that it is not within the power of any man to find a single scion of the Saxon race that has not held in utter abhorrence the efforts of him or them who sought to control the freedom of the ballot by the employment of the military power.

The very army of this country protests against such a prostitution of its service.

I see before me the justly-distinguished General-in-Chief of our army, and I do not believe that I overstate the fact when I say that from him down to the private in the ranks it is difficult to find one who has not recoiled from this service which they have been called upon to render.

It is this question, and it is none other, that I insist shall be kept before this House. We are declaring that the ballot shall be free. We are denying that it is either constitutional, legal, just, fair, or decent, to subject the sovereign to the surveillance of the soldier.

Now, upon that issue the gentleman from Ohio and his associates tell us that they stand committed. I answer so do we. We are willing to discuss it, and for my part I shall oppose any limitation being put upon this debate. If we cannot stand upon an issue so broad, so constitutional, so catholic, so fair, so free as this, then tell me, in Heaven's name, where are there battlements strong enough for us to get behind? Let it go to the country that one party asserts that the manacles shall fall from the limbs of the citizen, and that the army shall not hold its mailed hand at the throat of the sovereign, and that the other party refuses to release the throttling grasp, and declares that it will block the wheels of the Government and bring it to starvation.

I am willing, and those with whom I stand are willing to accept this issue, and we go further, we tender it. We are the ones to make the issue and we are ready for you to accept it. Planting ourselves upon this broad ground, we welcome controversy. We seek no quarrel with you, but for the first time in eighteen years past the Democracy are back in power in both branches of the Legislature, and she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off those degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgement of the liberty of the citizen.

We demand an untrammeled election; no supervising of the ballot by the army. Free, absolutely free right to the citizen in the deposit of his ballot as a condition-precedent to the passage of your bills.

Now, sir, if the gentleman from Ohio is to be excused—for surely he cannot be justified—if he is to be excused for parading before this House the threat, the argumentum in terrorem of a veto that is already cut and dried to be placed upon a bill that is not yet passed; if he is to be pardoned for warning this House that the executive branch of this Government will never yield its assent to this measure in its present form, may I not be warranted and justified in employing equal candor, and may I not assure that gentleman and his associates that the dominant party of this Congress, the ruling element of this body, is also equally determined that until their just demands are satisfied, demands sanctioned by all laws human and divine, protected and hedged around by precedents without number, demanded by the people of this land without regard to section, who are clamoring for a free, untrammeled ballot (not for the South, I beg you to remember, for if there be sectionality in this issue I cannot discover it); for Philadelphia as well as for New Orleans, for San Francisco and Boston as well as for Charleston and Savannah—that this side of the Chamber, which has demonstrated its power, never means to yield or surrender until this Congress shall have died by virtue of its limitation. We will not yield. A principle cannot be compromised. It may be surrendered, but that can only be done by its advocates giving proof to the world that they are cravens and cowards, lacking the courage of their own conviction. We cannot yield, and will not surrender.

Let me assure my friend, and it is a picture that I know he does not dwell upon with pleasure, that this is the restoration to power of a party as old as our Government itself, which for almost a hundred years has stood the boldest, fairest, freest exponent and champion and defender of the doctrine of constitutional limitations against the doctrine of the aggrandizement of power. It is this organization that has come back to rule, that means to rule, and means to rule in obedience to law.

Now, sir, the issue is laid down, the gage of battle is delivered. Lift it when you please; we are willing to appeal to that sovereign arbiter that the gentleman so handsomely lauded, the American people, to decide between us.

Standing upon such grounds, we intend to deny to the President of this republic the right to exercise such unconstitutional power. We do not mean to pitch this contest upon ground of objection to him who happens, if not by the grace of God yet by the run of luck, to be administering that office.

I tell you here that if from yonder canvas [pointing to the picture of Washington] the first President of this republic should step down and resume those powers that the grateful people of an infant republic conferred upon him as their Chief Magistrate, if he were here fired by that patriotic ardor that moved him in the earlier and better days of this republic, to him we would never consent to yield such dangerous and unwarranted powers, to rest the liberties of the citizen upon any one man's discretion, nor would he receive it.

It was not for the earlier but for the later Executives of this Government to grasp and seek to retain such questionable prerogatives. You cannot have it. The issue is made—it is made upon principle, not upon policy. It cannot be abandoned; it will not be surrendered. Standing upon such ground, clothed in such a panoply, resting this case upon the broadest principles of eternal justice, we are content to appeal to the people of this land. There is no tribunal to which we are not willing to carry this case of contest; and we are willing to allow Him who rules the destinies of men to judge between us and give victory to the right.

I do not mean to issue a threat. Unlike the gentleman from Ohio, I disclaim any authority to threaten. But I do mean to say that it is my deliberate conviction that there is not to be found in this majority a single man who will ever consent to abandon one jot or tittle of the faith that is in him. He cannot surrender if he would. I beg you to believe he will not be coerced by threats nor intimidated by parade of power. He must stand upon his conviction, and there we will all stand. He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned.

Eddystone Lighthouse.

It has been decided to erect a new tower for the Eddystone lighthouse about 128 feet from the present site. The focal plane will be raised to an elevation of 130 feet, and the range of light extended to 17¼ nautical miles. The new tower will be constructed, entirely of granite. The height will be 138 feet above the rock to the top of the cornice, and the diameter of the tower, under the cornice, will be 18 feet 6 inches. The tower will be solid (with the exception of containing a water-tank) to the height of 25 feet 6 inches above high-water springs. At this level will commence the side-walls, with a thickness of 8 feet 6 inches, diminishing to 2 feet 6 inches at the top. The tower will contain nine apartments, each 10 feet in height, in addition to the lantern, the seven uppermost being 14 feet in diameter. The estimated cost is £78,000.

The Future Emperor of Austria.

Rudolph, future Emperor of Austria, promises to be an accomplished and scholarly sovereign. He is an excellent linguist, a good scientific student, and has also fine literary abilities. As he desires to speak the language of every race he will one day have to rule over, he is now studying Turkish, that he may not be at a loss if he ever finds himself in Bosnia. He speaks ten languages already, seven or eight of which are used in the Austro-Hungarian empire. He is very popular with the soldiers, whom he always addresses in Czechian.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, APR. 24, 1879

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY, EDITORS.

Mr. Lorilard's American horse, Parole, won the mile and a quarter race at the Epsom (England) races, last Tuesday.

Congressman Colerick has our thanks for a copy of "An act to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses."

Vive le roi! will be the watch-word in the reception to be given to Grant by the dregs of the republican party, on his return to America.

The Fort Wayne Sentinel was sold last week to W. R. Nelson and S. E. Morss, who announce that some material changes will be made in that paper. The purchase was made for $30,000.

We ask a careful reading of the speech of Hon. J. S. C. Blackburn, of Kentucky, delivered in the house of representatives. It will be found on the third page of this paper, headed—"A Free Ballot."

The republicans have organized what they call a "National Emigration Society" with a view to transporting all the colored voters of the south to the north, in order to reduce southern representation in congress.

Since Gen. Bragg, of Wisconsin, has been appointed chairman of the committee on war claims, in congress, the northern radicals who have purchased rebel claims with the expectation of having them allowed by congress, are very despondent. Nine-tenths of the so-called rebel claims, are owned by northern radicals.

A dispatch from New York says: "Cyrus Field proposes erecting a monument to the English spy, Major Andre, and now proposes that one be erected to Nathan Hale, the first of the American martyrs to liberty. Hale was but 21 when executed, and his monument will represent him in the garb of a farmer in shirt sleeves, with neck bare, ready to receive the halter.

General John A. Dix died in New York last Monday night, after several weeks sickness, which was caused by the breaking of his collar bone by his arm twisting under him as he raised himself in bed. His last words were: "I believe in God, and have entire faith in Christ, my Redeemer. I am at enmity with no man."

The stalwarts of the republican party are in the field early, and are evidently well organized for the purpose of pushing Grant for a third term. Resolutions have been introduced in the legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania, providing for a committee from each, to receive Grant in the name of their respective states, on his return to this country.

The thieves, villains and cut-throats everywhere are a unit for Grant for a third term. Every whisky thief, every bribe-taker, every knavish government contractor, and every bloody-shirt radical in the land, is shouting for Grant, the champion whisky sucker and bigoted ignoramus, who has always depended upon the advice of corrupt politicians, always ready to do the bidding of any rascal who had the money to make any demand effective. Grant has all the qualifications to represent the republican party.

The son of "old John Brown" writes to the editor of the Cleveland Leader, from Put-in-Bay Island, that, although 58 years of age, he is willing to play the role of Moses and lead the southern negroes into Kansas, Nebraska and Colorado. John says he has no money himself, but he will go to work if the public will pay his expenses and the expense of settling the negroes. As some republican estimates have placed the expense of transferring the whole black population of the south at $200,000,000 the republicans will have to put up the cash pretty liberally. Give John a chance.

Gov. Hendricks' argument in the celebrated case of Swinney vs. the P., Ft. W. & C. R. R., which occupied the attention of the superior court at Fort Wayne for two weeks, took place Saturday morning, occupying two hours and a half. The court-room was filled with listeners, many of whom were ladies, all anxious to see and hear Indiana's great jurist and ex-governor. The jury went out at 4 o'clock p. m., returning the same evening with a verdict of $45,000 in favor of the plaintiff. This makes the third trial of the case, and it is not yet known when the next one will take place.

De La Matyr has struck it—he proposes to "inflate" the currency, and has introduced a bill in congress providing for a system of currency covering $1,000,000,000, the most of which is to be loaned to corporations (which he names in the bill) to be expended by said corporations in the employment of labor. The corporations named are such as would not make very strenuous exertions to refund the loan; for that reason it might have been as well to make the donation direct to the laboring men without requiring them to waste their time for the benefit of bankrupt corporations.

Here is a little sample of disunion slop from the Omaha Republican. It compares favorably with the remarks of our patriotic (?) McIntosh, as referred to last week. "The war goes bravely on; patriotic citizen soldiers stand courageously to their guns everywhere throughout the country, and are rapidly adding to their numbers. The General-President in command of Fort Washington expresses the opinion that the rebels will soon raise the siege, but as in the earlier stages of the rebellion, he stands ready to meet them in all emergencies and beat them back to the last ditch. He hears the loud command to hold the fort at all hazards, encouraged by the fact that every week of the siege adds tens of thousands to the patriot strength, and that millions stand ready to take the field at his call. With such a backing we guess Hayes will be equal to the occasion. Rebels may howl, but they must again submit and sue for quarter."

Dozens of radical emissaries are now engaged in interviewing the colored people on their arrival in the north. They meet the negroes at Cairo or St. Louis, each radical with his pockets full of affidavits drawn up to suit their own purposes, relating all kinds of abuse from the whites of the south; no statement is too rediculous or unreasonable to be made a part of the affidavit. The radical is authorized to administer oaths; he approaches the darkey who can neither read or write, asks him his name, which is written on the affidavit by the radical; the darkey makes his mark; holds up his right hand and is sworn. The affidavits are forwarded to the republican press of the north and east for publication. The radical party has a patent on the right to manufacture "southern outrages," and as the period for which the patent was issued (17 years) has about expired, an extra effort is being made to secure a supply sufficient for the demands of the next campaign.

Moderate indulgers in alcoholic beverages have organized a society in New York to encourage moderation. At a recent meeting the secretary of the society, in his address, told his audience that "the time had passed when a sensible man would say to an intelligent audience, in the expectation of being believed, that those who deal in alcoholic drinks are murderers, and that all who drink are on the downward road to hell." The society offers four forms of pledges. The first of a red color, is a pledge of total abstinence. The second is white, and binds the signer not to drink during business hours. The blue pledge prohibits treating at the public bars, and the last, on which is a flag of red, white and blue, limits the signer to nothing stronger than wine and beer, and permits these only at meals and in moderation. The pledges all begin with the words: "I hereby solemnly pledge my sacred honor," and no appeal is made to God for help. The secretary explains this ommission by saying that heretofore "entirely too much responsibility has been placed upon the Almighty."

According to a communication in the Ft. Wayne Sentinel of last Monday, concerning the appointment of a superintendent for the state asylum for the insane, we are inclined to believe that there has been undue haste on the part of the trustees of the benevolent institutions. It appears that one Dr. Fletcher has received, or is about receive, the appointment. Should such prove to be the case, we have no hesitancy in pronouncing the transaction an infamous outrage and villainous scheme, plotted and carried out in the interest of Indianapolis, as against other portions of the state. The northern counties were presenting the name of Dr. Davenport of Warsaw, for the position—a gentleman of untarnished character, of high standing, morally and socially, and a practicing physician and surgeon of undisputed ability. He has an extended acquaintance throughout the state, and his friends everywhere acknowledge his qualifications for the position. His endorsement by the leading democrats of the state has evidently been expected by the trustees, who in order to avoid a contact with public sentiment anticipated the appointment, which it was generally understood would not be made until the 29th inst. It is also asserted that Dr. Fletcher is not a democrat, which we judge is true, in-as-much as the Indianapolis Journal advocates his appointment. If Dr. Evarts is to be removed because he is a republican, why appoint another republican in his stead, especially an Indianapolis republican. The members of the board of trustees of the benevolent institutions were appointed as democrats, and if they expect the democratic press of the state to sustain the appointments made by the board, they must use nothing but first-class democratic timber. After eighteen years of slanderous abuse enunciated by radical demagogues, echoed and re-echoed by deluded followers, the democrats of Indiana are in no mood to trifle with representatives of the party who betray their trusts.

NEW MUSIC.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin."

A new song and chorus, by John T. Rutledge. This beautiful song is founded on Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's popular novel, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." It is a very popular song; so pretty that everyone falls in love with it as soon as they hear it. If you want a song that will always be a favorite, order "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Any music dealer will send it for 35 cents. Published by W. L. THOMPSON & Co. East Liverpool, Ohio.

The exodus of some of the negroes from the south, is the subject of general discussion by the press all over the country, especially in the west. It has been clearly demonstrated that the movement was originated by the republican party in order to revive the 'bloody-shirt," "bulldozing," "shotgun" and "intimidation" stories of former campaigns. The movement was originated as early as January, and must have been generally understood by leading republican organs, as their sympathies have been extended in a manner to show that the republican party has been, and is now, conspiring against the welfare of the negro. The following and similar circulars sent broadcast throughout the south, fully explain the origin of the excitement among the negroes:

[Strictly Private.]

ATTENTION COLORED MEN!

OFFICE OF COLORED COLONIZATION SOCIETY, }

TOPEKA, KAN., February 2, 1879.

Your brethren and friends throughout the north have observed with painful solicitude the outrages heaped upon you by your rebel masters, and are doing all they can to alleviate your miseries and provide for your future happiness and prosperity. President Hayes by his iniquitous southern policy, has deserted you, while the democrats, who now have control of congress, will seek to re-enslave you if you remain in the south, and to protect you from their designs the colonization society has been organized by the government to provide lands for each head of a family, which will be given in bodies of 160 acres gratuitously. This land is located in the best portion of Kansas, in close proximity to Topeka, and is very productive. Here there is no distinction in society, all are on an equality. Leave the land of oppression and come to free Kansas. LYCURGUS P. JONES, Pres't.

Show this circular to none but colored men and keep its contents a secret.

Other inducements were held out by the republican conspiritors to entice the colored people away from their southern homes. The lying emissaries are secretly distributing illustrated hand-bills among the ignorant negroes, containing pictures of large fruit and vegetables of all kinds, representing the products of the fertile lands of Kansas; also pictures of darkies riding fine horses, and in fine carriages, smoking cigars &c. All these inducements had a telling effect; the negroes disposed of the small amount of property they had, and are now flocking to Kansas by hundreds. What is the result? When they reach St Louis or Kansas City their means are exhausted, they find they have been deluded, the agent who was to look after them is not found, the climate is to cold for their scanty apparel, they sicken and die for want of protection by the negro loving republicans of Kansas. The poverty stricken wretches, weary and sick, are begging money to pay their way back to their homes in the sunny south. Wyandotte, Kansas, opposite Kansas City, is overrun with these people, and the mayor of the city has issued a proclamation intended to check colored immigration to that place. He warns all concerned that the city of Wyandotte will hold all boat officers, agents, or any persons who may be concerned in importing destitute persons to its shores, to the strictest legal consequences and penalties of the law attaching to such offenses. A committee of the same place, appointed to look after the sufferers, has issued the following call for aid:

The undersigned executive committee of the citizens' relief committee of Wyandotte, Kansas, make an earnest appeal for immediate financial aid to assist the sick, suffering and destitute colored refugees that destiny has suddenly thrown on the citizens of Wyandotte. Seventeen hundred entirely destitute are already here, and thousands more in the same destitute condition on the way. In the midst of this general suffering and great need for immediate aid, we send this Macedonian cry for immediate assistance.

Best Housekeepers.

If the best housekeepers in our land are to be believed, there are no flavoring extracts worth half so much as Dr. Price's Special Flavorings. Let Dr. Price's Vanilla, Lemon, Orange, Rose, Almond, or Nectarine flavors once be used, and they will always be desired.

Why Will You

Allow a cold to advance in your system and thus encourage more serious maladies, such as Pneumonia, Hemorrhages and Lung troubles when an immediate relief can be so readily attained. Boschee's German Syrup has gained the largest sale in the world for the cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung Diseases. It is Dr. Boschee's famous German prescription, and is prepared with the greatest care, and no fear need be entertained in administering it to the youngest child, as per directions. The sale of this medicine is unprecedented. Since first introduced there has been a constant increasing demand and without a single report of a failure to do its work in any case. Ask your Druggist as to the truth of these remarks. Large size 75 cents. Try it and be convinced. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

Newville.

—The growing wheat is looking fine in this vicinity.

—The people are busy plowing, sowing oats and making garden.

—Great excitement in town concerning the receipt of the new books for the library from Congressman Baker. Some are inclined to be displeased at out it, but they should keep cool.

—The township trustee is grading the school grounds, erecting a new fence and making other necessary improvements.

The Reason.

The reason for the unprecedented demand for Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, is the result of its being of superior strength, uniform quality, contains no unwholesome substance. Having thoroughly tested it, we have no hesitancy in recommending it.

Troy Township.

—Oat-sowing is now in order.

—Wes. Plank and John Rosenberry have gone to Michigan for the summer.

—John and Henry Zigler, from Wauseon, are here visiting relatives.

—Simeon Aldrich, Sr., one of DeKalb's pioneers, was buried last Tuesday.

—John Freeby's son-in-law, from Kansas, is here on a visit. He says he would not take 160 acres of land here as a gift, if he had to live on it. Don't anybody offer it to him —John Fink has nine ewes that produced twenty lambs this spring; twins seven times and triplets twice. Now send in your sheep stories.

—Daniel McClellan bought each of his six daughters ten yards of dress-goods, and when John Fink heard of it he followed suit, remembering his daughters-in-law similarly.

—A ditch eleven feet deep caved in on Socrates Mountz, a few days since, and his father had to dig him out.

St. Joe.

—W. H. Dills, of Auburn, paid a visit to his brother, J. W. Dills, last Sunday.

—Married, at the residence of the bride's father, Jas. H. Able, on Tuesday April 15, Wm. Hansford and Mary Furlong.

—The chap who likes to play euchre so well that he gets up out of bed to attend a card party, had better "look a little out." Wives don't like to be left alone.

—One of St. Joe's citizens was recently the recipient of a tongue lashing which he is not likely to forget soon. It was administered, as usual, by a female. Violent and unbecoming language was indulged in to a considerable extent, but nothing more.

—H. Gee and G. McIntosh had a tussle with some lawyers and a justice's court not long since, having disagreed about a financial transaction in which the sum of one dollar and five cents was involved. McIntosh came out winner, the jury returning a verdict of 57 cents in his favor, and settling the costs, amounting to $40, on Gee. The case will probably be tried again.

Honor to Whom Honor is Due.

MR. EDITOR:—We desire through the medium of your excellent paper to acknowledge the receipt of some very valuable books, over fifty nice volumes sent to our library and reading hall, by the Hon. J. H. Baker, member of congress from this district. We rejoice that we have a man to represent the people's interest, and one who has a desire to do justice to all his constituents, one that will dare to do his duty to all, without regard to whether they voted for him or not. There are some who think that Mr. Baker has no constituents except those who voted for him. Whilst we did not vote for Mr. Baker, still we feel willing to render him thanks when they are due to him. And if Mr. Baker comes into our county we would be very much pleased to have him come and deliver a lecture before our society, and we will try to greet him cordially. J. M. LAWRENCE.

In behalf of the society.

Ask Yourself these Questions.

Are you a despondent sufferer from Sick Headache, Habitual Costiveness, Palpitation of the Heart? Have you Dizziness of the Head? Is your Nervous System depressed? Does your Blood circulate badly? Have you a Cough? Low Spirits? Coming up of the food after eating? &c., &c. All of these and much more are the direct results of Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint and Indigestion. Green's August Flower is now acknowledged by all Druggists to be a positive cure. 2,400,000 bottles were given away in the U. S. through Druggists to the people as a trial. Two doses will satisfy any person of its wonderful quality in curing all forms of Indigestion. Sample bottles 10 cts. Regular size 75 cts. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

Persons of Taste.

The most refined nations have an appreciation of sweet odors, and find pleasure in the use of articles agreeable to the sense of smell. Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes are pronounced by the best judges to be superior in rich, fresh, flowery fragrance to any coming from abroad.

—W. H. Kiblinger & Co. have just received 2000 lbs. of Eckstine, Hill & Co's. white lead. 2000 lbs. of Saydam, Lawrence and company's white lead. 2000 lbs. Davis, Chambers and company's white lead. 1000 lbs. of English white lead. All of the above leads were bought before the advanced prices, which enables us to sell same at manufacturer's prices. Call on us before buying your leads and oils, and we will make you happy. Auburn, Indiana.

Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made it is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no [illegible] and will cut any [illegible] log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

—Yesbera is prepared to furnish spring styles of fine suitings at very low prices. Call and examine his stock before ordering your spring suit.

—A. S. Lauferty & Co., the enterprising Fort Wayne clothiers, have something new to say to their customers. Read their advertisement carefully.

—That dentist who was out so late Thursday night got a bad scare; couldn't see him for the dust he raised in getting up stairs. He has recovered, however.

—In the case of Penfield & Emanuel vs. A. C. Dawson, last Tuesday, the jury was composed of younger men than have ever done similar service in this county.

—Sherman Hollister, just as everybody had begun to think he had absconded, turned up this morning, his whole body wrapped up in a great big smile.

—Read the new advertisement of Root & Co., in another column. Notice the large list of fine goods mentioned, and call and see them when you go to Fort Wayne.

—Mrs. A. J. Little left Tuesday for the east and will return Saturday with an April line of millinery goods. Call and see them, third door north of the Auburn House.

—W. S. Sthair is so much crowded with work at his shop that he has been compelled to double his force of blacksmiths in order to complete buggies as fast as sold.

—Mr. H. H. Stamets makes millinery and fancy goods a specialty, and guarantees all work in the millinery department to give satisfaction. Give him a call and examine the new styles.

—Mr. H. H. Stamets has secured the services of a city trimmer—Miss Anna Williams, and is now better prepared than ever before, to please the ladies with new spring hats and bonnets.

—Owing to the closeness of times the town trustees have extended the time of paying town tax fifteen days from this date, April 15, 1879.

T. P. Scott, Town Marshal.

—We notice, in some of our exchanges, a rather lengthy article entitled "Why Women Marry." A limited but close observation prompts us to state that it's because the other women do.

—Two wayfarers of the tramp breed made a burglarious attempt on the grocery of Frank A. Hoff, Saturday night, and succeeded in getting—left. The night watchman was "on" the scheme.

—Abright has the most handsome and convenient bed-room alarm clocks we have ever seen. They are real beauties, and just as convenient as they are beautiful. Every family ought to have one.

—The Auburn House is being greatly improved by the addition of another story on the east wing. Mr. Bashelier has leased the property for three years, and is making the improvement at his own expense.

—Mess Shearer & Wilson are now manufacturing a lot of the "Perfect grain and grass-seed cleaners and separators" for Ensley & Shilling, the same to be used as samples for canvassing agents.

—The Cincinnati Enquirer thinks that it is a poor mule that will not work both ways. The poorest mule we ever saw would work three or four ways, when nobody was expecting it, and do it all at once.

—If the ladies of the country desire to exchange their produce for a new hat or bonnet, they can do so at the millinery store of H. H. Stamets. He pays the highest price for eggs, either in cash or trade.

—We have tried a sack of Mr. Markle's flour, manufactured at the Pearl mills, Hudson, Ind., and found it strictly first-class. We advise our friends to try it; they can get it at McQuiston & Ralston's, Martin & Son's or Miller & Getrost's.

—Our city water works are again in operation, the little engine on the south side of the square having been engaged in filling the tank. This may have been a trifle premature, as it's liable to freeze up and burst yet.

—Notwithstanding the large number of Cincinnati buggies now in this market, Mr. W. S. Sthair is unable to supply the demand for his work. When you get a buggy or carriage from him you get a good solid job.

—It would be a surprise-party to see two men consecutively pass Kiblinger & Co's. store without ringing the big bell which sets on the side-walk. About nine out of every eight give it a kick, smile, and pass along satisfied.

—An affable and pleasant conductor greatly enhances the pleasure of railway travel. Such a one can be found in the person of Horace Cooper, the genial and accommodating head man of the Ft. W., J. & S. accommodation.

—We call the attention of our readers to the new advertisement of Messrs. Shearer & Wilson, who are prepared to contract for the erection of buildings of any kind, or for the manufacture of sash, doors, moulding, wire screens, &c.

—Remarks concerning the weather are always current and apropos; allow us to state, then, for the benefit of our readers abroad—in France and Germany—who will be overjoyed to hear it, that we are daily receiving large invoices of it.

—He thought he heard "the angels sing," but it proved to be a chorus of exclamations from the next door children, as they looked upon their mother's beautiful new bonnet, bought at Nicholas Ensley's millinery and fancy goods store.

—Albion is worked up over a shooting scrape which took place Monday night, of last week, between M. H. Cazier and W. F. Hersch, in which the latter was shot through the—leg. As usual, a young lady figures prominently in the case.

—The Republican man wants all the girls to discard their facial beauty and peevishness, and learn to scrub, and build dough-nuts. Remember this, girls; otherwise, your fond hopes are liable to be blasted, as he is evidently deeply interested.

—We sell the celebrated hardly ever wear out hand-made calf boot for $3.50—the best and cheapest calf boot on earth for the money, sold everywhere all over the country for $4.50. A good calf boot for $2.25 at the boot up-side down.

—A Fort Wayne eating-house man economizes space in signs by putting so much "reading matter" on one street-lamp, that he left no room for punctuating. The number of his establishment is 205, and this is the way he shows it: "Eating house 205 meals for 20c." Cheap 'nuff.

—A good time is reported by the young folks who took in the Waterloo dance last night. Six pairs and a half—each of which, in cases like this, is better than three of a kind—participated, returning at the bewitching hour of 3 o'clock, g. m.—"good morning."

—That fellow who went into a restaurant the other day, and asked for a dozen oysters, was a dandy. The waiter asked him how he would have them dressed. "Dressed!" exclaimed the unsophisticated youth, "hang it, I don't want 'em dressed at all; I wan't 'em naked, and don't you forget it."

—Our enterprising manufacturer, Mr. James Anderson, is again in the market with a lot of first class carriages and buggies of his own manufacture, which he will sell at low figures, and on one year's time with approved security. He defies any shop in Northern Indiana to furnish better material than is used in his work. 9-9w

—We regret to mention that Mr. G. H. K. Moss, is still in delicate health. Himself and family have commenced a tour of the south-western states and territories, hoping to improve his physical condition during the coming summer. We hope his travels may be both pleasant and beneficial.

—The man who tried to impose on an intelligent community by registering as "John Quincy Adams," last week at the Swineford house, can't take us in by any such device. We have been told that John Quincy Adams died in 1848, and we can furnish proofs that he has been dead ever since.

—The following letter from a young man was lately addressed to a probate judge: "Sir. My father departed this life not long hence, leaving a wife and five scorpions. He died detested, and his estate is likely to prove insolvent. I was left executioner, and being told that you were judge of reprobates, apply to you for letters of condemnation."

—Some work has already been done this spring, on the avenue to the junction, and as soon as the ground is thoroughly settled a sufficient force will be put to work to complete the job. The county commissioners have agreed to aid in the enterprise, and the B. & O. railroad is expected to furnish the gravel.

—Thursday's Kendallville Standard says: "John Robinson, of this township, laid a hen's egg on our table last week that measured 8½ inches by 6½ and weighed 4¼ ounces. We claim the championship." Lord! we should think you would. There isn't a man in this county who can lay a hen's egg half that size.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. Sent for one stamp. Address

Murray Hill Pub. Co.,
No. 129 E. 28th St., N. Y. 11-6m.

—A long line of Cincinnati buggies have been standing in funeral style along 9th street this week, looking their best and enticing purchasers. Owing to pecuniary oppression, we only took four; bought 'em on long time—life-time, with no interest,—and we are going to hitch up some evening and take our girl out in all of 'em at once.

—While calling at the recorder's office a few days since, Recorder Boland exhibited to us a vast number of old deeds, the accumulation of years, on which the dust of ages had apparently settled, and on which the recorder's fees had also settled, as the majority of them were still unpaid and uncalled for; and the chances are that they will always remain so, as many of the parties have long since passed over the river.

Stephens' subsidiary coin bill passed the lower house of congress on Tuesday last. It provides that silver coins of smaller denomination than $1, may be exchanged into lawful money when presented in sums of $20; makes lawful money exchangeable into silver coins in like amounts; makes subsidiary silver coins legal-tender for all debts (public and private) in sums of not exceeding $20; makes minor coinage receivable at postoffices to the amount of $3.

—It was funny to see "Kib." trying to elude Constable L. J. Hopkins the other day. The latter wanted him on the jury, but the former didn't want it that way. "Kib." saw him coming, skipped out the back way, shot into a barn with wonderful dexterity, and up into the hay-loft, where he resorted to all the stratagem his fertile brain could conjure; but all to no avail. The constable was too many for him, and he was forced to throw up the sponge, which he did reluctantly; but he sat on the jury, just the same.

—To recall the circumstances in the case of Mrs. W. W. Humes is unnecessary, as most of our readers are familiar with them. The troubles which have surrounded her resulted in mental derangement, and it has been found necessary to confine her in the jail. She is spoken of as an attractive and estimable lady, which tends to render her case a particularly sad one, and she has the sympathy of the entire community in which her affliction has come upon her. As soon as the necessary papers are prepared, she will be conveyed to the insane asylum.

—In passing one of the finest residences in the city, a few days ago, we observed what seemed to us to be an imposing monument placed among the shrubbery in front of the mansion. We were led to a closer inspection and found the following incomprehensible epitaph in bold characters:

SACRED
MEMORY
BULL.
SLIPPED OFF
April 13, '79.
2 MORE.

We have not had an opportunity to interview the proprietor for an explanation, and prefer not to mention the matter to the lady of the house, for fear that we might be "one" of the "2 more."

Periodicals.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE FOR APRIL, republished by the Leonard Scott Publishing Co., 41 Barclay Street, New York, opens with the first part of a new story, from which we may infer that "John Caldigate" is drawing to a close.

"My Latest Experience" describes the treatment or "cure" prescribed at the Baths of Enghien, not far from Paris.

"Hamlet." This is a long dissertation on the Hamlet of Shakespeare and that of Mr. Irving.

The article on Contemporary Literature this month explains the difficulties encountered in writing biographies, adding brief notices of some of the latest of such works.

The concluding article of an unusually good number considers "the character and import of the present depression of trade regarded from a commercial and national" as well as a political point of view.

ST. NICHOLAS FOR MAY

has a May song in it, and a coronation of course, but no May queen. It is a sort of story number, and has nearly 40 pictures. Besides the two serials, there are a spider story, an elephant story, a gunpowder story, a bear story, an astronomical story, a mythological story a botanical story, a mathematical story, a story of a girl who couldn't, and more than one of girls who could, besides an astounding tale of a boy who made a man and found him a very difficult person to manage. Altogether it is a capital number, and will be sure to receive a hearty welcome from the boys and girls.

SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY FOR MAY

Scribner's is a "magazine for the people," as its title imports, because it is a magazine of the people, interested in all that the people care for. Its literature, as literature, is of the highest class; the most eminent of the young and active generation of authors either have grown up under its auspices, or constantly seek its columns. Its criticisms are broad and impartial, and the admirable story of "Haworth's," in the present volume, is the work of a writer whose literary fame was achieved in the pages of Scribner's Monthly. Here are such summery articles as those on the "Tile Club at work," and the "Tile Club at Play," perfect models of what an illustrated article should be in engraving and letter press. And here are such biographical articles as the one on Leonardo da Vinci and the one on John Leech. Is it literary biography and anecdote that one wants? The charming sketches of Longfellow and Emerson, accompanied by Wyatt Eaton's portraits, will please you. Descriptive illustrated articles—Bird Architecture "The Douglass Squirrel," "In a Snallery and so forth—delight the lover of natural history; while there are more than we can name of papers on field sports in wild regions, on travels in the Sierra, in the Stickeen river region, and we know not where besides.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR MAY.

The May number of Harper's Magazine is very richly illustrated, containing over one hundred engravings that may confidently challenge comparison.

Colonel Waring's third Tyrol paper takes us from Botzen to Waidbruck, and them unveils the wonders of Grodner Thal—the most curious and interesting of the Tyrolese valleys. The illustrations of character and of the mountain scenery are superb. Not the least interesting feature of the paper is Colonel Waring's account of his visit to William Howitt (who has recently died) in his summer tent at Dietenheim.

The Art paper of the number is devoted to "The Study of Art in Boston"—an admirable and comprehensive treatment of the subject by George P. Lathrop, with twenty-eight fine illustrations.

Julius Wilcox contributes an interesting article, amply illustrated, on "The Piano and its Antecedents."

The principal article in the number, as regards timely interest, is William Winter's beautiful paper about Stratford-upon-Avon—now the theatre of a festival commemoration on the occasion of the dedication of the Shakspeare Memorial building.

Edwin P. Whipple contributes a masterly personal sketch of Motley, the historian.

William Blaikie's paper on "The Risks of Athletic Work" is timely and important.

The illustrated story of the number, "Lord Allen's Daughter," by Mrs. E. W. Latimer, is full of thrilling incident.

—A big point in the successful management of a livery-stable is to keep rigs in good order, as people will learn where the best vehicles are kept, and will go there. Paint up your buggies, then, livery-men, and keep your harnesses well cleaned and oiled.

—A meek and lowly individual, with as heavy a cargo of tangle-foot on board as he could gracefully handle, wanted lodging at the Central Monday night; he hadn't the ducats to pay therefor, but would "call around to-morrow"—would settle in the sweet hereafter. But Uncle Tom wouldn't have it that way; says he has sworn off on that kind of business; so the boozy gentleman wandered around on the street until taken in by the night-watchman, who furnished him a flowery bed of ease in the cooler, "free gratis for nothing."

—Chas. Bennett, yard-master of the B. & O. road at Tiffin, Ohio, was brutally attacked by tramps last Saturday morning, while on duty at that place. It is supposed that he had ordered them out of the yard, when they assaulted him with coupling-pins, crushing his scull and injuring him so that he cannot possibly recover. A similar attempt was made on a Defiance freight-conductor, who refused them free rides, though with not such serious results. Deeds of this kind are recorded every day, and the fiendish work continues with impunity; this, too, in a civilized nation!

—A. O. Miller, as a negro caricaturist has but few equals, as was demonstrated last night to a small audience, at Ensley's hall, who had assembled to see "Over the Hills to the Poor-house" Mrs. A. O. Miller, as Mrs. Reed, the horse-thief's mother, could not well have been improved upon; and Wm. Brooks, personating the unfortunate but innocent son, Hugh Reed, did his part very creditably, though he at times exhibited some hesitancy, not having fully committed his part to memory. Under the adverse circumstances occasioned by a rather defective stage and fixtures, and considered all in all, the drama was well presented, and we regret that "Muzzle" was not greeted with a more satisfactory audience.

—Through the kindness of Postmaster Rainier, we were permitted to gaze upon one of the new ten dollar interest bearing certificates, now being issued by the United States Treasury, which are equally as safe and convenient as gold or greenbacks for circulation, and interest on their investment will be constantly accruing, therefore they are better to hoard than either silver or gold.

These notes are convertible with accrued interest at 4 per cent. per annum into 4 per cent. bonds of the United States, issued under acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, upon presentation at the office of the Treasurer, Washington D. C., in sums of $50 or multiples thereof.

The certificates are a little shorter and somewhat wider than legal tender notes, which they otherwise resemble. A vignette of Benjamin Franklin is in one corner of the face side, with the figures and word ten in the other corner. They are dated April 1, 1879, and certify that the sum of $10 has been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States under act of February 26, 1879; this certification bears the signatures of the Treasurer and the Register, and the Treasury seal.

On the back of the certificate are the words "ten dollars," and the following: "Interest on this note will accrue as follows: For each 9 days, or 1-10 of a quarter, 1 cent; for each quarter year, 10 cents; for each entire year, 40 cents."

The supply of these certificates is limited, owing to the bid of the New York bankers for the entire issue. They will only be on sale at our postoffice for a short time, and not more than $100 can be sold to one individual.

He is Coming.

G. S. McCord will canvass the county this spring and summer with his patent feather renovator on wheels. This machine has won a reputation in Auburn, and vicinity, that recommends it to the public. This process of steaming and cleaning feathers only needs a trial; it recommends itself, will remove all filth and increase the size of a bed from one-third to one-half and give the feathers the life and appearance of new ones; no damage to the feathers whatever. Price still lower than ever. Don't be humbugged; don't let your beds go from your house; if we don't suit you, we don't take your money.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on

TWO OF THEM.

In the farm-house porch the farmer sat,
With his daughter having a cosy chat;
She was his only child, and he Thought her as fair as a girl could be.
A wee bit jealous the old man grew
If he fancied any might come to woo!
His one pet lamb and her loving care
He wished with nobody else to share.

"There should be two of you, child," said he—
"There should be two to welcome me
When I come home from the field at night;
Two would make the old homestead bright.
There's Neighbor Grey with his children four,
To be glad together. Had I one more
A proud old father I'd be, my dear,
With two good children to greet me here."

Down by the [illegible] elm-tree
Donald waited alone; and she
For whom he waited his love-call heard,
And on either cheek the blushes stirred.
"Father," she said, and knelt her down,
And kissed the hand that was old and brown—
"Father, there may be two if you will,
And I—your only daughter still.

"Two to welcome you home at night;
Two to make the old homestead bright;
I—and somebody else." "I see,"
Said the farmer; "and whom may 'somebody' be?"
Oh, the dimples in Bessie's cheek,
That played with the blushes at hide-and-seek!
Away from his gaze she turned her head,
"One of Neighbor Grey's children," she said.

"H'm!" said the farmer, "make it plain;
Is it Susan, Alice or Mary Jane?"
Another kiss on the aged hand,
To help the father to understand(?).
"H'm!" said the farmer, "yes; I see—
It is two for yourself and one for me."
But Bessie said, "There can be but one
For me and my heart till life is done."

MY MIDNIGHT PERIL.

The night of the 17th of October—shall I ever forget its pitchy darkness, the roar of the autumnal wind through the lonely forest, and the incessant downpour of the rain.

"This comes of short cuts;" I muttered petulantly to myself, as I plodded along, keeping close to the trunks of the trees to avoid the ravine, through which I could hear the roar of the turbulent stream forty or fifty feet below. My blood ran cold as I thought what might be the possible consequences of a misstep or a move in the wrong direction. Why had I not been contented to keep in the right road?

Hold on! was that a light, or my eyes playing me false?

I stopped, holding on to the low resinous boughs of a hemlock that grew on the edge of the bank, for it actually seemed that the wind would seize me bodily and hurl me down the precipitous descent.

It was a light—thank Providence—it was a light, and no ignis fatuus to lead me on to destruction and death.

"Hallo-o-o-o!"

My voice ran through the woods like a clarion. I plunged on through tangled vines, dense briers and rocky banks, until, gradually nearing, I could perceive a figure wrapped in an oil-cloth cape, or cloak, carrying a lantern. As the dim light fell upon his face I almost recoiled. Would not solitude in the woods be preferable to the companionship of this withered, wrinkled old man? But it was too late to recede now.

"What's wanting?" he snarled, with a peculiar motion of the lips that seemed to leave his yellow teeth all bare.

"I am lost in the woods; can you direct me to R—— station?"

"Yes, R—— station is twelve miles from here."

"Twelve miles!"

I stood aghast.

"Can you tell me any shelter I could obtain for the night?"

"No."

"Where are you going?"

"To Drew's, down by the maple swamp."

"Is it a tavern?"

"No."

"Would they take me for the night? I could pay them well."

His eyes gleamed; the yellow stumps stood revealed once more.

"I guess so! folks don't stop there."

"Is it far from here?"

"Not very; about half a mile."

"Then make haste and let us reach it. I am drenched to the skin."

We plodded on, my companion more than keeping pace with me. Presently we left the edge of the ravine, entering what seemed a trackless wood, and keeping straight on until lights gleamed fitfully through the wet foliage.

It was a ruinous old place, with the windows all drawn to one side, as if the foundation had settled, and the pillars of a rude porch nearly rotted away.

A woman answered my fellow-traveler's knock. My companion whispered a word or two to her, and she turned to me with smooth, voluble words of welcome.

She regretted the poverty of their accommodations; but I was welcome to them, such as they were.

"Where is Isaac?" demanded my guide.

"He has not come in yet."

I sat down on a wooden bench beside the fire, and ate a few mouthfuls of bread.

"I should like to retire as soon as possible," I said, for my weariness was excessive.

"Certainly." The woman started up with alacrity.

"Where are you going to put him?" asked my guide.

"Up chamber."

"Put him in Isaac's room."

"No."

"It's the most comfortable."

"I tell you no!"

But here I interrupted the whispered colloquy.

"I am not particular—I don't care where you put me, only make haste."

So I was conducted up a steep ladder that stood in the corner of the room, into an apartment, ceiled with sloping beams and ventilated by one small window, where a cot bedstead, crowded close against the board partition, and a pine table with two or three chairs, formed the sole attempts at furniture.

The woman set the light—an old oil lamp—on the table.

"Anything more I can get you, sir?"

"Nothing, thank you."

"I hope you will sleep well, sir. When shall I call you?"

"At 4 o'clock in the morning, if you please. I must walk over to B—— station in time for the 7 o'clock express."

"I'll be sure to call you, sir."

She withdrew, leaving me alone in the gloomy little apartment. I sat down and looked around me with no very agreeable sensation.

"I will sit down and write to Alice," I thought; "that will soothe my nerves and quiet me, perhaps."

I descended the ladder; the fire still glowed redly in the hearth beneath; my companion and the woman sat beside it talking in a low tone, and a third person sat at the table eating; a short, stout, villainous-looking man, in a red-flannel shirt and muddy trousers.

I asked for writing materials and returned to my room to write to my wife.

"My darling Alice—"

I paused and laid down my pen as I concluded the words, half smiling to think what she would say could she know of my strange quarters.

Not till both sheets were covered did I lay aside my pen and prepare for slumber. As I folded my paper I happened to glance toward the couch.

Was it the gleam of a human eye observing me through the board partition or was it my own fancy? There was a crack there, but only blank darkness beyond, yet I could have sworn that something had sparkled balefully at me.

I took out my watch—it was 1 o'clock. It was scarcely worth while for me to undress for three hours' sleep. I would lie down in my clothes and snatch what slumber I could. So, placing my valise at the head of my bed, and barricading the lockless door with two chairs, I extinguished the light and lay down.

At first I was very wakeful, but gradually a soft drowsiness seemed to steal over me like a misty mantle, until, all of a sudden, some startling, electric thrill coursed through my veins, and I sat up excited and trembling.

A luminous softness seemed to glow through the room—no light of the moon or stars was ever so penetrating—and by the little window I saw Alice, my wife, dressed in floating garments of white, with her long, golden hair knotted back with a blue ribbon. Apparently she was coming to me with outstretched hands, and eyes full of wild, anxious tenderness.

I sprung to my feet and rushed toward her, but as I reached the window the fair apparition seemed to vanish into the stormy darkness, and I was left alone. At the self-same instant the sharp report of a pistol sounded—I could see the jagged stream of fire above the pillow straight through the very spot where ten minutes since my head had lain.

With an instantaneous realization of my danger I swung myself over the edge of the window, jumping some eight or ten feet into tangled bushes below, and, as I crouched there recovering my breath, I heard the tramp of footsteps into my room.

"Is he dead?" cried a voice up the ladder—the smooth, deceitful voice of the woman with the half-closed eyes.

"Of course he is," growled a voice back; "that charge would have killed ten men. A light there, quick, and tell Tom to be ready."

A cold, agonized shudder ran through me. What a den of midnight murderers had I fallen into! And how fearfully narrow was my escape!

With the speed that only mortal terror and deadly peril can give, I rushed through the woods, now illuminated by a faint glimmer of starlight. I know not what impulse guided my footsteps—I never shall know how many times I crossed my own track, or how close I stood to the brink of the deadly ravine, but a merciful Providence encompassed me with a guiding and protecting care, for, when the morning dawned, with faint, red bars of orient light against the stormy eastern sky, I was close to the high road, some seven miles from R——.

Once at the town, I told my story to the police, and a detachment was sent with me to the spot.

After much searching and many false alarms, we succeeded in finding the ruinous old house; but it was empty—our birds had flown; nor did I recover my valise, and watch and chain, which latter I had left under my pillow.

"It's Drew's gang," said the leader of the police, "and they've troubled us these two years. I don't think, though, they'll come back here just at present."

Nor did they.

But the strangest part of my story is yet to come. Some three weeks subsequently I received a letter from my sister, who was with Alice in her English home—a letter whose intelligence filled me with surprise.

"I must tell you something strange," wrote my sister, "that happened on the night of the 17th of October. Alice had not been well for some time—in fact, she had been confined to her bed for nearly a week—and I was sitting beside her reading. It was late—the clock had just struck 1—when all at once she seemed to faint away, growing white and rigid as a corpse. I hastened to call assistance; but all our efforts to restore animation were in vain. I was just about sending for the doctor when her senses returned as suddenly as they had left her, and she sat up in bed, pushing back her hair and looking wildly around her.

"Alice," I exclaimed, "how you have terrified us all! Are you ill?"

"Not ill," she answered, "but I feel so strange. Gracie, I have been with my husband!"

"And all our reasoning failed to convince her of the impossibility of her assertion. She persists to this moment that she saw you and was with you on the morning of the 18th of October. Where and how she cannot tell, but we think it must have been a dream. She is better now, and I wish you could see how fast she is improving."

This is my plain unvarnished tale. I do not pretend to explain or account for its mysteries. I simply relate facts. Let psychologists unravel the labyrinthian skein. I am not superstitious, neither do I believe in ghosts, wraiths or apparitions; but this thing I do know—that, although my wife was in England in body on the morning of the 18th of October, her spirit surely stood before me in New York in the moment of the deadly peril that menaced me. It may be that to the subtle instinct and strength of a wife's holy love all things are possible, but Alice surely saved my life.

A REMARKABLE EXPERIMENT.

Efforts of Nashville Physicians to Restore Knox Martin to Life.

[From the Atlanta Constitution.]

The hanging of Knox Martin, in this city, attracted an immense assemblage. As Martin dropped, a number of eager doctors gathered around his suspended form. After the slight convulsive movements had stopped they began to apply tests to discover when animation ceased. It had become generally known that an effort would be made to restore Martin to life. By many it was treated jestingly, but with the little knot of professional men about the scaffold the matter was a serious one. The report of the proposed experiment had spread through the crowd, and it was with the utmost difficulty the police could keep anything like order. In ten minutes all the doctors had pronounced Martin dead. With a distrust natural when doctors had such an interesting subject in prospect, Sheriff Price made them look him in the eye and give their opinion. Still, to prevent any possible trouble in case the experiment proved successful, the Sheriff would not let the rope be cut until fully fifteen minutes had passed. Mr. Cotton had no sooner cut the last strand than the eager hands of the medical men eased the rope to the ground. It was the work of an instant to remove the loop from his neck, and efforts were at once taken to restore the dislocated bones to place and relieve pressure on the spinal cord. The coffin was pulled from under the scaffold, and the dead body placed therein. Several persons took hold, and, surrounded by physicians, students, and curious spectators, the coffin was hurriedly taken to the crown of an adjacent hill. Here a cow-shed had been covered with canvas. A guard of police was on hand, but nothing could restrain the impetuosity of the crowd. The coffin was brought in and laid on the ground. Several persons roughly crowded in, until the air became so hot and close that breathing was a difficult operation. The crowd outside pressed up to the shed, and now and then a plank would be pulled off to give a better view of the interesting proceedings within. Some of the more adventurous started to mount the top of the shed, while the apprehensive cries of those inside, fearful of a falling in, mingled with the curses and demands for more room. They pressed hard on the body of the negro, and even had he been half alive his chances of resurrection would have been small.

Just as soon as the coffin dropped to the ground, Martin's shirt, pants and shoes were torn off, and then began a vigorous rubbing of his legs and arms, while efforts were made to restore breathing by alternate pressure and relaxation on the chest. His head was raised, and in a minute a strong galvanic battery was attached. All began to work and watch for the least signs of returning consciousness. The perspiration poured from the brows of the experimenters, and with more than one of them there was a feeling of faintness. Remarks, not expressive of the least possible chance of the doctors' success, were fully passed around, but still the medical men worked away, and the spectators craned their necks for a glance now and then at the object of so much interest. At last convulsive twitching of the muscles of the face was noticed. Then a movement was discernible in his limbs, and finally—the most remarkable and satisfactory portion of the experiment—the body gave three deep-drawn gasps for air. After that the efforts seemed to meet with no response, and shortly the doctors ceased operations. The experiment proved an interesting if not entirely successful one. With the usual length of time for hanging, and a place where plenty of pure air could have been obtained, there is some probability Martin might have been revived.

Age of the World.

Geologists, astronomers, and physicists alike have hitherto been baffled in their attempts to set up any satisfactory kind of chronometer which will approximately measure geological time, and thus give us some clew to the antiquity of the globe. It is therefore worth noting that Mr. Mellard Reade, of Liverpool, has lately contributed to the Royal Society a very suggestive paper, in which he endeavors to grapple with the question by employing the limestone rocks of the earth's crust as an index of geological time. Limestones have been in course of formation from the earliest known geological periods, but it would appear that the later-formed strata are more calcareous than the earlier, and that there has, in fact, been a gradually progressive increase of calcareous matter. The very extensive deposition of carbonate of lime over wide areas of the ocean bottom at the present day is sufficiently attested by the recent soundings of the Challenger. According to the author's estimate, the sedimentary crust of the earth is at least one mile in average actual thickness, of which probably one-tenth consists of calcareous matter. In seeking the origin of this calcareous matter, it is assumed that the primitive rocks of the original crust were of the nature of granitic or basaltic rocks. By the disintegration of such rocks, calcareous and other sedimentary deposits have been formed. The amount of lime-salts in waters which drain districts made up of granites and basalts is found, by a comparison of analyses, to be on an average about 3.73 parts in 100,000 parts of water. It is further assumed that the exposed areas of igneous rocks, taking an average throughout all geological time, will bear to the exposures of sedimentary rocks a ratio of about one to nine. From these and other data Mr. Reade concludes that the elimination of the calcareous matter now found in the sedimentary strata must have occupied at least 600,000,000 of years. This, therefore, represents the minimum age of the world. The author infers that the formation of the Laurentian, Cambrian, and Silurian strata must have occupied about 200,000,000 of years; the old red sandstone, the carboniferous, and the poikilitic systems, another 200,000,000; and all the other strata, the remaining 200,000,000. Mr. Reade is, therefore, led to believe that geological time has been enormously in excess of the limits urged by certain physicists; and that it has been ample to allow for all the changes which, on the hypothesis of evolution, have occurred in the organic world.—The Academy.

The Starving Egyptians.

The natives of Upper Egypt are at present furnishing an illustration of how much more exacting Oriental tyranny becomes when it borrows some of the methods of modern civilization. They have not yet been absolutely starved to death, but for months past they have been so insufficiently fed that almost any form of sickness has proved fatal. Fifteen or twenty years ago, before the Khedive had the interest on a foreign debt to pay, these Arabs were not in an enviable condition, for they were obliged to work hard raising crops, and then turn in a large proportion of the yield to the Government agents. But in this their lot was the common one of most Eastern people, and they were doubtless shrewd enough to cheat their rulers when pushed too hard. Now, however, the raising of the Egyptian revenue is largely in the hands of keen-witted foreigners, who are determined that the bondholders shall be satisfied. One means of enlarging the receipts that has been resorted to has been to increase the production of sugar; but, in order to do this, land that was formerly used by the natives for their own purposes has been taken, and, what is more, the natives from the district around each sugar factory are compelled to abandon work in their own fields, and furnish gratuitously the manual assistance needed in the Government mills and plantations. A recent traveler up the Nile describes the condition of affairs there as infinitely more wretched than ever they were in the worst days of negro slavery in this country, for the people are driven with whips to their work in the fields by men who have not that sense of ownership which in a large degree tempered the cruelty of slavery. The sacredness of a contract may be open to question when, to fulfill it, it becomes necessary to starve to death 200,000 or 300,000 innocent people. If the French and English bondholders must have satisfaction, it is a pity they cannot in some way secure it at the personal expense of the real offender, the Khedive.

The Carriage Trick.

A certain builder of carriages made a practice of keeping a carriage on hand to palm off on the executors of deceased noblemen. It was a costly vehicle, handsomely fitted up. As soon as the death of a nobleman occurred, the carriage was decorated with the arms of the deceased in the best style of herald painting. With this preparation, a letter was dispatched to the executors respectfully inquiring when it would be convenient to remove the carriage which had been built according to the orders of his Lordship. It had been some time ready to be taken away, and the price was £190, or some such sum. This unpleasant announcement usually led to a compromise. The carriage not being wanted, a sum of money was paid by the executors to take it off their hands. This was precisely what was anticipated. The carriage was now ready for a fresh start in plundering. The armorial bearings were obliterated, and the panels were prepared to receive the heraldic blazonry of the next nobleman on whose executors the same trick could be played off. Very clever this; but, like all rogueries, it was at length found out, and a loss of reputation ensued. What became of the carriage that had undergone so many transformations we know not.—Chambers' Journal.

Soldiers as Homesteaders.

The Secretary of the Interior has rejected an application made by Gen. Jeff C. Davis, of the regular army, to enter a tract of land under the Homestead law. Gen. Davis claimed that under sections 2,293 and 2,308 of the Revised Statutes he was entitled to make a homestead entry, and to have a patent issued thereon, without actual residence on the land, basing his claim upon the ground that his service in the regular army was equivalent to residence upon the land. The Secretary decided that the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to apply only to persons who served in the military and naval service of the United States during the War of the Rebellion, and who before or after entering the service had made entries which had been canceled, or upon which the claimant could not make final homestead proof on account of his absence in the army or navy, and that an officer, soldier or sailor who enlisted in the regular army or navy since the close of the Rebellion is not entitled to homestead privileges while in such service.

His Preference.

A Detroit policeman, who had business on Division street, had his attention attracted to the conduct of a tow-headed boy of 10, who dodged out of a house, crossed the street, and returned and went over the same route several times. The officer asked him if his mother was sick, and the lad chuckled and replied:

"Not very sick! She's mad at the woman over there, and I'm carrying telegrams between 'em. Mother first asked her to take it back, but she wouldn't; then mother dared her out, but she wouldn't come; then she called mother names, and now I'm going over to tell her that mother says that her sister is in the work-house. I think that will start her."

"Are you anxious for peace between them?" asked the officer.

"Well, kinder; but as long as ma has got her mad up, and a towel tied over her hair, I'd a leetle rather see the show open!"

Why a Horse Balked.

A Hartford man recently bought a young horse for $200. Within a week or two the horse began to act badly, and finally developed such a balky disposition that the new owner could do nothing with him. Persuasion of every kind and finally severe beatings were resorted to; but still the horse remained stubborn. At last, in a desperate mood, the horse was taken to the original owner, who bought him back for $25. The cause of the whole trouble was soon discovered. The horse had been broken to wear a hames collar, and had never worn any other kind—his new owner had put a breast-collar on him after using him a little while, and no one "happened to think" that this change had produced the sudden obstinacy in the animal. Wearing the collar to which he had been accustomed, the horse is all right again, and the gentleman who has got him back at a profit of $175 in six weeks considers him worth fully $200 again.—New Haven Palladium.

BY BALLOON TO THE POLE.

A Bold Briton's Proposed Journey to the Ice-Locked Regions of the Far North.

[From the New York Tribune.]

Commander Cheyne, of the British royal navy, is making efforts to get up an expedition to reach the North pole by means of balloons. He is an experienced Arctic navigator, having served under Sir James Ross, and has secured the services of Capt. Templar, a well-known aeronaut. Commander Cheyne believes that the gulf stream sweeps round the polar basin, and returns by the north and east of Greenland as a great body of cold water. He proposes to utilize this current in the following manner: The ship would proceed up Davis' strait and Baffin's bay; then, turning to the west, would steam up Lancaster sound and Queen's channel to the farthest explored point. She would next take a north-northwesterly direction until the set of the current was felt, when her course would be altered to due north. In any case, she would push on through every available opening in the ice until her advance was definitely arrested by the advent of winter. In addition to the usual equipment of sledges, etc., the vessel would carry several balloons, each one capable of lifting about a ton weight in addition to the men. When the ship became beset in the pack, three balloons would be inflated and joined together by means of three light spars sixty feet long. Thus a triangle would be formed, with a balloon at each angle, the whole together representing a lifting power of about three tons. This power would be employed in carrying the boat-cars, sledges, provisions, tents, ballast, etc. Commander Cheyne proposes during the winter to establish two observatories about thirty miles apart, with the ship as a center, so that by the end of May the balloons may start upon a curve already ascertained with tolerable accuracy. By this means, the distance of the vessel from the pole, and the course to be followed being known, the travelers would be enabled to drop within ten or twenty miles of their destination. Wire trail-ropes would be used for preserving an equal altitude above the ice. When it was necessary to descend, the gas would be preserved by recompressing it, by mechanical means, into the receivers, there to be held in readiness for future use. If the journey should have been successful and the wind favorable, the return trip would at once be made, the balloons being arrested on the parallel of latitude upon which the ship was left ice-blocked. The commanding officer in charge would send out sledge parties daily to meet the balloons and give whatever assistance might be required. On the breaking up of the ice the ship would leave her winter quarters and push round the northern extremity of Greenland. A second winter would here be passed, the time being spent in making a survey of the coast and other scientific observations. During the following summer, aided by he natural drift of the ice, the vessel would steam through every opening, and return home between the continent of Greenland and Spitzbergen. Should no favorable wind arise, however, to carry him back from the pole to his ship, Commander Cheyne intends continuing his journey, and trusts to good fortune to drop in Russia wherever inhabitants are to be seen.

The Original Brother Jonathan.

Gov. Jonathan Trumbull, of Connecticut, was the original "Brother Jonathan." He was always so addressed by Gen. Washington, and finally the whole Yankee nation, and especially New England, became sobriquetted, characterized and identified in the person of "Brother Jonathan." Trumbull, a plain, unassuming, honest, common-sense man, who resided in Lebanon. When in full dress, "Brother Jonathan" Trumbull looked very much as he is now represented in what is generally supposed to be a caricature. He was of a tall, gaunt form, and wore a swallow-tail, home-spun coat, manufactured in his family out of wool raised on his own farm, and colored with maple-bark procured from his own wood-pile, the dye being set with iron filings obtained from the blacksmith-shop in the neighborhood. His genteel, tight-fitting trousers, reaching six inches short of his ankles, were made of striped linsey-woolsey, prepared and spun in his own family.—Philadelphia Press.

American Meats in England.

The recent large and continuous importations of American fresh meat and provisions into the North of England, says the London Times, are producing quite a revolution in the trade of the butchers in towns such as Newcastle-on-Tyne, Gateshead, Shields, and Sunderland, especially those supplying the working classes. American fresh meat of really excellent quality is sold in shops, which have been opened by companies, at 8 pence per pound for best roasting pieces, and from 7 pence to 5 pence per pound for other qualities. They have very large sales, and, in many instances, the opening of these shops has had the effect of bringing down prices of English beef 2 pence per pound. A large quantity of American bacon and hams is sold at retail in the northern towns. The price is from 8 pence to 4 pence per pound. A very excellent quality of American bacon is sold among the working classes at 5 pence per pound in pieces.

It costs $4,000,000 annually to educate the children of the United States.

THE TWO LIGHTS.

"When I'm a man," the stripling cries,
And strives the coming years to scan—
"Ah, then I shall be strong and wise,
When I'm a man!"

"When I was young," the old man sighs,
"Bravely the lark and linnet sung
Their carol under sunny skies,
When I was young!"

"When I'm a man, I shall be free
To guard the right, the truth uphold."
"When I was young I bent no knee
To power of gold."

"Then shall I satisfy my soul
With yonder prize, when I'm a man."
"Too late I found how vain the goal
So while I ran!"

"When I'm a man these idle toys
Aside forever shall be flung."
"There was no poison in my joys
When I was young."

The boy's bright dream is all before,
The man's romance lies far behind.
Had we the present and no more,
Fate were unkind.

But, brother, toiling in the night,
Still count yourself not all unblest
If in the east there gleams a light,
Or in the west.

TO FIND out whether a garden has been planted or not, a paper gives the following rule: "If one forgets whether beds are planted or not, a good way to tell is to turn a stray cat into the garden. If the beds are planted, the cat will proceed to race round and dig into them, and act as if it had relatives in China it was anxious to get at; when they are not, it will sit down calmly in the path, and seem to be meditating on the progress of missionary work in Africa. A cat's instinct seldom deceives in this matter."

IT is said of Northern Texas, by the Dallas Herald, that the tillers of the soil there make far more provisions than they have any use for; always have corn and meat for sale, and their cotton and cattle crops come in as clear profit. GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

The Rights of Woman.

The rights of woman, what are they?
The right to labor, love and pray,
The right to weep when others weep,
The right to wake when others sleep.

The right to dry the falling tear,
The right to quell the rising fear;
The right to smooth the brow of care,
And whisper comfort to despair.

The right to watch the parting breath,
To soothe and cheer the bed of death,
The right when earthly hopes all fail,
To point to that within the vail.

The right the wanderer to reclaim,
And win the lost from paths of shame;
The right to comfort and to bless
The widow and the fatherless.

The right the little ones to guide,
In simple faith to Him who died;
With earnest love and gentle praise,
To bless and cheer their youthful days.

The right to live for those we love,
The right to die that love to prove;
The right to brighten earthly homes,
With pleasant smiles and gentle tones.

Are these thy rights? then use them well;
Thy silent influence none can tell.
If these are thine, why ask for more?
Thou hast enough to answer for.

Some Lucky "Catches."

The following American ladies have been married to British peers or the sons of peers since 1825: In 1825, Mrs. Patterson, eldest daughter of Richard Caton of Maryland, to the Marquis of Wellesley; in 1828, Louisa, third daughter of Richard Caton, and widow of Sir Felton Bathurst Hervey, bart., to the Duke of Leeds; in 1836, Louisa, second daughter of Richard Caton, to Lord Stafford; in 1845, Mary, daughter of John McTavish of Baltimore, to the Hon. Henry John Howland, brother of the late Earl of Carlisle and the Duchess of Sutherland; in 1850, Elizabeth, sister to the late Gen. Wadsworth of Genesseo, to the Hon. Sir Charles Augustus Murray, son of the Earl of Dunmore; in 1852, Ellen, daughter of Edmund Dwight of Boston, to the Hon. Edward Turner Boyd Twistleton, son of Lord Saye and Sele; in 1874, Miss Jerome, daughter of Leonard Jerome of New York, to Lord Randolph Churchill, son of the Duke of Marlborough; in 1876, Miss Consuelo Yznaga of New York, to Viscount Mandeville, heir apparent of the Duke of Manchester; and in 1877, Sophia, daughter of S. Wells Williams of New Haven, to the Hon. Thomas George Grosvenor, son of Lord Ebury. If to these should be added the names of American ladies wedded to grandsons of peers, baronets, or knights, the list would be considerably extended.

Women Clerks.

While it is not true that all the marriageable women in the treasury expect to marry senators, or expect to marry at all—for I know many who are young and attractive who prefer their independence to selling themselves for a home and support—it is true that the following men, as highly placed politically and socially as ever was Simon Cameron, have married ladies employed in the treasury within the past dozen years. In 1867 or 1868, Baron von Havre, a genuine German Baron, of wealth and position, then charge d' affairs of the Belgian legation here, married Miss Camilla Webb, a clerk in the office of the comptroller of the currency, a handsome girl, of superior mind and character, and belonging to an excellent though pecuniarily unfortunate family. Mr. Tyner, when a member of congress about seven years ago, married a lady employed in the treasury, who, when he became postmaster-general in Grant's cabinet, was among the "cabinet ladies," and received every possible attention. Senator Christiancy married a clerk of the treasury in 1876. Two governors of states—Fairchild and Chamberlain—found their wives there, and Judge Brewster, of Pennsylvania, a man of aristocratic tastes, one of the most prominent members of the bar of the state, and at one time attorney-general of Pennsylvania, married a treasury employe, whose father, Robert J. Walker, was once secretary of the treasury. There are too many widows, sisters and daughters of men, who once held the most honored positions in the nation, now toiling in government departments, to admit of those who temporarily occupy the places once theirs, scoffing at them as a class.—Washington Corres. Boston Herald.

The Chances and Tendencies of Widowers and Widows to Marry Again.

The view sometimes expressed, in pleasantry or otherwise, that marriage presents illusions to those who have not entered upon it, and that experience of it has rather a deterrent influence with regard to repeating the experience, has lately been put to the test of statistical facts by M. Bertillon.

He inquires first into the nuptiality or chance of marriage of widowers. If they equal or exceed bachelors in their ardor for marriage, the conjugal state can hardly be maligned. It is necessary here to compare widowers and bachelors of the same ages. M. Bertillon, accordingly, constructs curves based on data from Holland (being the fullest obtainable). It appears that of 1,000 men of 25 to 35 years of age, 110 or 112 marry each year. On the other hand the corresponding number for widowers is 356, or three times as many. At other ages the difference is still greater, widowers marry four times more than bachelors of the same age, and in the case of young men (21 and under) the numbers are 290 and four respectively. Diagrams for France, England, and Belgium give like results.

Next the author inquires into the nuptiality of divorced men. The facts of their bad experience of marriage, their liability to rejection as bad spouses, and sometimes their having children, would seem in favor of their continuing unmarried. The numbers show that while up to 26 years of age divorced men marry less than bachelors of the same age, after 26 they exceed these considerably. They do not, indeed, attain to the readiness of the widowers until 40 years of age, when they actually marry more than widowers. (This applies to Holland and Switzerland, the only countries from which data were obtainable.) There is the possible explanation that some men get divorced from one wife to marry another. But a like explanation would hardly apply to many widowers, viz., that they procured the death of one wife for another.

The general conclusion is that marriage, far from causing regrets in men who contract it, it creates habits, on the contrary, the deprivation of which is much felt. In the case of females, M. Bertillon obtains similar results, though less decided. From 25 to 30 years of age, when Dutch girls marry most, widows are found to marry about twice as much, and a corresponding difference appears throughout similarly in Switzerland and England. There are two exceptions to this rule, however. In the city of Berlin widows past 30 marry almost exactly in the same proportions as spinsters. And in France they marry a little less.

The state of young widowhood seems to press the same everywhere. Is the state of things in France, then, to be explained by saying that "I prefer to believe," says M. Bertillon, "that they leave widows absolutely inconsolable?" Divorced women give a curve pretty similar to that of divorced men. Up to about 30 years of age they marry considerably less than spinsters, beyond that they show a greater disposition to marriage than even than the widows, and this difference continues to the end of life.—London Times.

The Dansita.

Every country has a dance peculiar to it alone, and that of Central America is the dansita. The music for this dance is peculiar, changing key three different times and my experience in the dance is equally peculiar. Encircling the waist of a beautiful black-eyed senorita with my right arm, I whirled, or rather was whirled, away in a round dance the step of which was similar to the balance step of the waltz, the pretty slippered feet of my partner keeping exact time to the music. Meeting another couple, the music having here changed time, we balance, and the ladies change three times. Suddenly the musicians, having become warmed to their work, a quick, brisk air is played, and, clasping your partner around the waist with your right arm, your left similarly encircling the waist of the other lady, the other gentleman having likewise disposed of his arms, the ladies put their arms around the waists of the gentleman, and you are initiated into the mysteries of a dance unequalled by any other in its voluptuousness. Taking a step with your left foot you are facing your partner; so close are you to her that the sweet breath from between her red lips fans your heated brow; you gaze into the liquid depths of her eyes; you feel the beating of her heart in unison with yours; only for a moment is this; still embracing and in the embrace of the two Spanish beauties, you revolve upon your right heel and are brought face to face with the other lady, excited with the pleasure of the dance, her bosom rising and falling faster and faster in the effort to breathe; her brilliant, darksome orbs fascinate you and steal your senses. Now to the left, now to the right, you balance in quick succession, imparting a weaving motion to your body, one moment facing your partner, the next greeting the smile of the other senorita, until, intoxicated with beauty and blind with dizziness, you lose all idea of earth and seem to be floating in space, and are only recalled from your enchantment by the shrill note which concludes the music and the dance.—Indianapolis Herald Correspondence.

Mexican Women.

The dress of the country ladies, as exhibited infrequently upon the calles of Vera Cruz, is showy, but not elegant; a worked chemise, with light, open jacket and a richly-embroidered or spangled petticoat of some soft, light-colored cloth, often blue or scarlet, seems to be the unvarying costume. When riding they are generally seated on a clumsy, box-like side-saddle, with their feet on the right side of the horse, exactly the reverse of the attitude to which we are accustomed, and which presents anything but a graceful appearance. In the country they are said often to ride with a foot on each side, though that refreshing spectacle has not yet crossed my range of vision. It is not uncommon, however, to see a paysana mounted on the same horse before her cavaliero, who, seated behind his fair one, supports her by an arm thrown round her waist—a fashion which, if introduced with us, would tend greatly to increase the healthful habit of equestrian exercise. As the women here wear neither hat nor bonnet, the cavaliero, as a mark of respect and attention, places his hat upon her head, and supplies its place on his own with a handkerchief—a practice which, if introduced with us, would speedily insure a return to pedestrianism.

Returning from the market, my eye fell upon another and more pleasant type of the motley Mexican population. Advancing toward the stand I was just quitting came the swaying figure of a young girl, her rebozo open, and her long wavy hair escaping in plaits from beneath it; her complexion of a slight umber tint; her bare brown shoulders rising above a chemise of snow-white lawn, elaborately embroidered, with short sleeves fringed with lace; her swelling bust clearly defined beneath the transparent fabric; around the slender waist, which had never been deformed by stay or corset, a tincture of crimson silk crape, from which three short petticoats fell in graceful folds over her pliant hips, with a skirt, lace-bordered, and so scant as to show underneath a well-turned ankle and tiny bare foot, with the daintiest of satin slippers poised upon its toe. Above, a pair of jet black eyes, glancing under a profusion of purple-black hair, adorned with the fresh flowers of the orange and suchli.

If you get into a Vera Cruz church in the early morn, and sit awhile in the silence of some sombre corner, you will turn instinctively and look about, feeling that a pair of eyes have magnetized you into seeking them; you will know them at once, for they are such as glanced up at me from under that shining crown of hair—black, limpid, grave, perhaps, with an innocent artfulness, a repressed merriment behind them, which harmonizes well with the forced demureness of the mouth. They look out complacently at you from under the folds of the rebozo that covers them; not furtively, but meeting your glance firmly if interrogatively. They might be the eyes of a chanting angel in heaven, or of a young child dreaming at a threshold upon earth, were it not for the suggestions of passion and daring, defiance and ambition which slumber in them. She is very proud, this poblana, daughter of the people, and yet is only a sumptuous woman, who loves her poor jewels, her lovers, her serenade upon the mandolin, and dreads, like any other woman, the cold, dark, silent earth.—Corres. N. Y. Evening Post.

Fashion Notes.

THE coming bonnet is the gypsy.

LACE is the feature in spring millinery.

THE short skirt is as short behind as before.

A NEW dress material is called Damasse bunting.

ALL sorts of hats, bonnets, turbans and caps are in vogue this spring for outdoor as well as indoor wear.

ROSE pink, pale blue, old gold and reed green are some of the colors used for the ten-button silk gloves.

NEW YORK dressmakers use a foundation of navy blue gingham for the bandana dresses, making the kilt plaitings, collar and vest of the handkerchiefs.

WHITE and colored Canton crape bonnets, trimmed with flowers, feathers, and lace, appear at the openings among other millinery novelties.

ARROWS composed humming bird's feathers are used for fastening white lace on the crown or side of fine white straw bonnets.

SMOOTHLY-BANDED hair, with very little frizzing on the forehead, and chignous worn low, is the fashion which has, all of a sudden, been adapted in Paris.

THE prettiest thing yet invented to be worn inside a dress that opens in the shall fashion, is the folded kerchief of transparent linen lawn.

SPRING ulsters for ladies are distinguished by buttons about the size of an ordinary soup plate, and by the most pronounced style of pockets.

BROAD-BRIMMED hats are more suitable for our bright, warm American summers than English round hats, and are much more becoming.

LACE MITS with long gauntlets will be in style again as soon as warm weather comes, and every lady can take the mitten herself without having it given her.

THE favorite flowers for tacking on bonnet crowns are asters, marguerites, pansies, and eglantine blooms, with the yellow anthers showing plainly on the delicate pink ground of the petals.

LIGHT summer silks, which will be much used for street suits, have chinchilla stripe, or narrow-clouded chine stripes, set close together on brown cardinal, garnet, blue, and other colored ground.

THE quaintest mixture of color appear in mummy cloths, as stripes of yellow, green, pink and white, all mingled together, and patterns resembling Satsuma ware, with creamy grounds and small flower designs and shades of brown. Sevres blue, and scarlet.

DRESSY parasols for the country or seashore are of ecru pongees, with spots, rings, or diamond patterns of brown, red, or blue, or they are of plain ecru pongees with bandana or Scotch plaid linings, or gray-colored linings with white polka dots.

Old Wine.

Grace Greenwood, in her London letter to the New York Times, thus comments on the approaching celebration of the anniversary of the destruction of Pompeii:

In the course of his sermon or lecture that morning, Mr. Conway spoke of the approaching celebration of the eighteen hundredth anniversary of the destruction of Pompeii, to take place in that resurrected city, a grand commemorative festival, which would fill the old forums, temples and theatres with crowds as vast and varied as were gathered there on that fatal festa when the ashen rain descended and the salt floods came. He stated that a jar of wine had been discovered in one of the lately excavated cellars of a rich villa, which was "there all the while" during that mighty eruption in the year Anno Domini 79—when they wist not it was Anno Domini—and perhaps was old wine then. This jar it is proposed to open and drink on the day of commemoration. How strange it will seem to modern archæologists to smack their lips, or make wry faces, as the case may be, over wine such as left its red on the lips of Virgil, such as gave its flavor to the lyrics of Catullus and its sparkle to his epigrams, such as Sallust grew merry over, and Juvenal genial. Now, if the phonograph had been a little Roman or Pompeian, or Athenian "notion," these nineteenth century revelers might be able to open an amphora of sonorous Cicero, or treat themselves to an after-dinner speech of Demosthenes, or broach a bottle of old Pliny, or uncork a bacchanal ode of Anacreon and let is fiz!

Carry the News to the Pill Man!

The Dutch settlers in South Africa are exceedingly fond of physic, and although extremely penurious in all other ways, niggardly, in fact, to the last penny, they will not scruple at the slightest symptom of illness to send for a doctor. Should a surgeon once obtain repute, deservedly or otherwise, his fortune is certainly made. The most ridiculous circumstances often insures to him this good luck, and the amount of money he receives yearly is sometimes very surprising. General Cunynghame was told that a medical practioner lost his credit by simply prescribing the use of liberal ablutions to an elderly lady. Her husband was dreadfully angry, making his remonstrance in the following terms: "Young man, you are a stranger in this country, and recommend new customs, which are contrary to usages which we know to be the true rules to health. I have been now married to my 'vrow' for thirty-five years, during which time water has scarce touched her body. It is not, sir, by your persuasion that such inroads can be made into our manners; you are ignorant of our mode of life and do not understand our wants."

A MINISTER once had a colored servant in whom he placed much confidence, and often gave him his manuscript for perusal and criticism. On one occasion he had arranged a sermon from that passage where the devils were permitted to enter the herd of swine. The minister asked asked his opinion. The man declined; said he didn't like to tell; but upon being urged, said, "Well massa, if I must tell, I should think you made wus work among de hogs den de devil did."

Orange Groves and Alligators.

There are some wonderful orange groves in the town, or "the city," as the inhabitants persist in calling the place. Those most remarkable belong to Dr. Anderson and to the estate of the late Mr. Ball of New York. This latter place, on which about $80,000 were expended in improvements some few years ago, is now for sale. If the plains around St. Augustine were covered with such groves as these the town would be the most beautiful in the world. The groves of Dr. Anderson and the Ball estate are close together. To wander through them on a fine morning, when a gentle breeze is coming in from the sea or to sit on a bench in the midst of the fragrant leaves, with the robins, the blackbirds and the cardinals saucily inviting you to declare your purpose, and with the golden fruit hanging within reach of your arm (and with permission to pick it!)—these are pleasures which no one fails to appreciate. The lemon trees here produce fruit of astonishing size and excellent quality: and the oranges are exquisite. On the Ball estate there is an avenue of great length, bordered by orange trees, the boughs of which bend under hundreds of oranges. To right and left path lead away to conservatories, gardens and lawns swept by fresh breezes and dotted with pretty groups of flowers. This is a little earthly paradise during the winter months. Dr. Anderson's grove is one of the most famous in the south, and is exceedingly profitable. His residence fronts on a street charmingly embowered in orange, lemon and magnolia trees, and lined with handsome cottages. Outside the town, a road leads across the marshes on a causeway, and on the marshes snipe abound just now. A northern visitor who was passing these fens with me laughed at the sign, "No Trespassing Here," which arose on a pole out of some suspiciously resistible soil, but if he had known that it was a snipe country, he would not have laughed. It was in these bottoms that an alligator hunter was once nicely caught, as he told me some years since. Coming home from a chase after the skins of the wily saurian, he was wading the marshes wearily, with his gun on his shoulder, when he felt his right leg seized, and looking down saw that a moderate sized alligator had grasped him, Nothing but his heavy boot leg saved him from being badly wounded. He brought his gun down with terrific force on the creature's head, uttered a fearful yell and managed to jump clear of his adversary. His hair stood straight on end ere he stopped running of the edge of the swamp. The alligator is not seen so often in this vicinity as in other days, nor does he condescend to show himself much on the waters of the St. John's, as the young men worry him with their pistol shots. On the borders of the small streams tributary to the great river the monsters swarm; they are not pretty, and their "smile" is so gigantic that one does not feel inclined to dispute the probability of Mr. Boffin's hiding behind it, as that veridical historian, Charles Dickens, informs us that he did in Mr. Venus's work-shop. An alligator is so much in color like a floating log that people in small boats need to be exceedingly wary. The moccasin snake is another enemy which poisons the tranquility of the wanderer in Florida forests. "Deadly?" said a sportsman to me; I think they are. You are a dead man in five minutes if they strike you, without some remedy, and there are millions of them. Rattlesnakes too." But these interesting creatures are only seen in the town, the habit of the farmers and herdsmen of burning over the ground twice a year destroys a great number of them. The ground is turned up at once after the fire and furnishes food to the half-starved cows which struggle in the forest. An animated protest against this system has been made by northern settlers, who frequently found that their fences have gone up in a general conflagration.—Edward King in Boston Journal.

How to Pay a Compliment.

To pay a compliment is to tell the truth, and to tell it as though you meant it. And the only way to do that is to mean it. If a girl is pretty or accomplished; if she plays well, or sings well, or dances well, or talks well; if, in a word, she pleases, why, in the name of common sense, shouldn't she be told of it? Don't blurt it out before everybody. That will only serve to make her feel uncomfortable and make you appear ridiculous. Say it quietly when opportunity offers, but say it strongly. Convey the idea distinctly and fully, so that there may be no mistake about it. But don't say it "officially." Formality is about the coldest thing known. More than one maiden has been made happy—say for half an hour—by a man's taking the trouble to say a pleasant thing about a toilet that he liked, and many of fashion's follies have been given up by girls when they notice a discreet silence concerning them on the part of their gentlemen friends. A bewitching little black-eyed beauty once said to a gentleman, "I like to have you say sweet things to me, it seems to come so easy and natural." In general terms, it may be said that it is always better to say an agreeable thing than a disagreeable one, better for all parties. The gallant who, when a young lady stepped on his foot while dancing and asked pardon, said, "Don't mention it; a dainty little foot like that wouldn't hurt a daisy," not only told the truth, but doubtless felt more comfortable than the boor who, when his foot was stepped on, roared out, "That's right; climb all over me with your great hoofs."—Boston Transcript.

The Trouble With Names.

A clever Massachusetts verse maker, at the beginning of the present century, was originally named Thomas Paine. He was of a highly respectable Boston family, and the well known Thomas Paine being at that time particularly obnoxious the young man jocosely asked the legislature to give him a Christian name. There is an unfortunate lady in Washington named Mary Oliver. Another coincidence is that she is a clerk in the office of the controller of the treasury, and a that she was appointed at the instance of the Hon. Simon Cameron. Since the scandalous suit begun by the other Mrs. Oliver, the innocent woman, Mrs. Oliver the second has been tormented by "interviewers," and has suffered so much pain and humiliation that her hair has actually turned gray. Though confusion of this kind is not uncommon, nobody is proof against such annoyance, except, perhaps, the members of the Smith family. When a Smith is in a scrape, nobody pretends to know which Smith it is, and the whole tribe is presumed to ye innocent, with a single rather indefinite exception. And speaking of Smiths, here is a Mr. Jones in this city—Mr. Sidney Colford Jones—who is described as "a gentleman living upon his income," which is a pleasant way of living if the income be large enough. Last Wednesday he adjured the court of common pleas to permit him to drop the name of Jones and to be legally known as Mr. Sidney Clifford. "Because," he said, "there are altogether too many Jones in the country, and especially in New York city." Well, there are a few. Whoever will look into the directory will find them there by hundreds, and singularly enough there are two Sidney C. Joneses. Of James Joneses and of John Joneses there is an end, but it takes a long time to get to it. Upon the whole, as a mere matter of convenience, the gentleman acted wisely, and undoubtedly the letter carriers will be of the same opinion.

Josh Billings Gives Some Very Sagacious Advice to "Quire" Singers.

DEAR MISS: This is an important epock into your life. The 1st thing to make a good quire singer is to giggle a little.

Put up your hair in cirl papers every Friday nite sose to have it in good shape Sunday morning. If your daddy is rich you can buy some store hair. If he is very rich buy some more and build it up high upon your head; then git a high-priced bunnit that runs up very high, at the high part of it, and git the milliner to plant some high grown artafishels onto the highest part of it. This will help you sing high, as sophrano is the highest part.

When the tune is giv out, don't pay attention to it, and then giggle. Giggle a good eel.

Whisper to the girl next you that Em Jones, which sets on the 2d seet from the front on the left-hand side, has her bunnit with the same color exact she had last year, and then put up your book to your face and giggle.

Object to every tune unless there is a solow into it for the sophrano. Coff and ham a good eel before you begin to sing.

When you sing a solow shake the artafishels off your bunnit, and when you come to a high tone brace yourself back a little, twist your head to one side and open your mouth the widest on that side, shet the eye on the same side jest a triphle, and then put in for dear life.

When the preacher gits under hed wey with his preachin, write a note onto the blank leaf into the fourth part of your note book. That's what the blank leaf was made for. Git sumbody to pass the note to sumbody else, and you watch them while they read it, and then giggle.

If anybody talks or laffs in the congregashun and the preacher takes notis of it, that's a good chants for you to giggle, and you ought to giggle a great eel. The preacher darsent say anything to you bekaus you are in the quire. If you had a bow before you went into the quire, give him the mitten—you ought to have sumbody better now.

Don't forget to giggle.

Peninsular Virginia.

The soil of peninsular Virginia is rather kindly than rich. Certainly it has not that richness of virgin land of which it is said, "Tickle it with a hoe, and it laughs in a harvest;" but light manuring produces a quick return and ample crops, and that considerably earlier than in other places north of Norfolk. There is still a remnant of the old style of farming to be seen, of which it was said that there were only three crops raised in Virginia—corn, hogs and niggers, of which the hogs ate all the corn, and the niggers devoured all the hogs. One of these "crops," however, is removed from the list.

The "poor white" is poor—very poor. The small farmers of the north can not compare with these in absolute destitution of money.

"Doctor," said one of them, who had slowly recovered consciousness after being terribly injured by an exploding grindstone—"doctor, I reckon I'm pretty badly bruck up, ain't I?"

"Yes, my man; you are hurt just about as badly, to stand a chance of recovery, as any man I ever saw."

"That's so, that's so. Wa'al, doctor, do you know, thet ez poor ez I am, an' ez much ez I need money, I wouldn't ev hed this happen to me fer—fer twenty-five dollars!"

Many of these poor whites are day-laborers on the neighboring farms, but others work a small patch of potatoes or corn on their own account, in ground mostly so filled with stumps and so given to overgrown bushes as to be useless to any but themselves. One sometimes sees them working in their fields. Paterfamilias does the ploughing, Filius Minimus drops the corn, and the rest come in regular sequence, Mater leading the hoeing.

The poor are woefully ignorant, as the upper classes are, in many instances, indolently unprogressive, though far less so than formerly. In short, the Virginia portion of the peninsula seems sunk in a Rip Van Winkle sleep that has lasted a hundred instead of twenty years, and that as yet shows but small signs of awakening.—Howard Pyle, in Harper's Magazine.

The Siamese Twins Outdone.

Prof. Pancoast has been exhibiting and explaining the Carolina twins to the students of the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. They are the pair who have been widely shown as a two-headed girl. The professor considers them far more wonderful than the Siamese twins, who were two distinct persons, while these negro sisters have a single back bone below the shoulder blades, at which point the spinal column branches like the letter Y. They were back to back at birth, but in learning to walk they twisted themselves to facilitate locomotion, and now stand nearly side by side. Experiments showed that when either was touched below the point of union both felt it, but above that point there was a separate sensitiveness. Dr. Pancoast thinks they will die simultaneously.

THE SHIP OF STATE.

BY LONGFELLOW.

"Sail on, sail on, O ship of state!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity, with all its fears,
With all its hopes of coming years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate.
We know what master laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast and sail and rope,
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge, and what a heat,
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope.
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale.
In spite of false lights on the shore,
In spite rock and tempest's roar,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea.
Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee.
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee."

Rules for the Sanctum.

A western editor has the following rules posted on the door of his den, which he facetiously calls the sanctum:

1. Gentlemen upon entering here will leave the door wide open.
2. Those having no business will remain as long as possible; take a chair and lean against the wall; it may prevent its falling.
3. Gentlemen are expected to smoke, especially during office hours; tobacco will be supplied.
4. Spit on the floor and put your cigar in the inkstand; spittoons are only for ornaments.
5. When we are busy talk loud or whistle; if this has not the desired effect, sing.
6. Put your feet on the table or lean against the desk; it will assist those who may be writing.
7. Persons having no business at this office will call early and often or excuse themselves.

The Fashionable Wife.

The fashionable wife looks on her husband's money as spoil—something which he wants to guard and she to seize. It is no joint property, which it is as much her interest as it is his to save and use wisely; but an enemy's possession, which it will be her gain to lose. As for companionship—an evening spent with her husband alone counts as the ne plus ultra of dullness. Personal love for him has died out, even if it once existed under the guise of passion, because of novelty; and whatever she may be to others, her husband finds her uniformly cold and repellant. Motherhood is her bugbear; children unwelcome intruders; and there is no more miserable woman extant than the fashionable wife with a baby, that hinders her from joining in the season's vulgar pleasure. Essentially selfish and shallow, love has little meaning for her as the doctrine of duty or the glory of sacrifice; and those who know her stand in a kind of wonder at the scheme of creation which includes among its offsets a being without virtues—a woman with presumedly a soul like any other, absolutely destitute of the love which saves the world from worse than death—of the reality which seeks truth and lives in it—of all the nobleness of aspiration and all righteousness of life, a woman whose god is pleasure and her one sole religion—fasion.

Hard Luck.

Among the recent arrivals in the State Penitentiary at Richmond, Va., were a bridal couple whose crime consisted in getting married and for which they have been sentenced to five years' imprisonment. The bridegroom is a negro, named Edward Kinney, aged about forty years, and the bride a white woman, named Mary Hall, aged in the neighborhood of thirty-five years. Kinney owns a farm in Hanover county, and was considered well-to-do. He had been living unlawfully with the woman Mary Hall for a considerable period, and in October last was threatened with prosecution for illegal cohabitation. In order to avoid this and escape the penalties imposed by the state law for the above offense, the pair went to Washington and were there united in the holy bonds of matrimony under and according to existing laws of the District of Columbia. They came back man and wife to Kinney's home, in Hanover county, believing that they had conformed to all the requirements of the law, and were happy at last. This was a sad mistake, however, for they were soon afterward indicted by the grand jury of Hanover county and tried for violation of the state law forbidding the intermarriage of persons of different races. They were foundguilty and sentenced to five years' imprisonment, as above stated. This action was taken under the decision of the state court of appeals, rendered at Staunton, in a case precisely similar in circumstances last fall.

A Terrible Machine.

The international marriage office, established in Italy some twelve years since, is said to be doing a good business. It forwards circulars regularly to every spinster, widow, or matrimonially eligible woman—our feminine compatriots sojourning in the land of sun and song receive them periodically—informing them fully of the benevolent object of the society. It requires a statement of the fortune and how invested, the permanent address, photograph, and every obtainable particular of applicants for its service—secrecy strictly guaranteed. These items are duly recorded, and correspondence and interviews are arranged between persons who wish to become acquainted with one another for connubial purposes. A preliminary cash deposit to secure good faith and to cover incidental charges is exacted, and if the match be consummated, a certain commission, ranging from two to five per cent., is to be paid by the bridegroom. As may be inferred, nearly all, if not quite all, are fortune-hunters, who expect to get the commission from the bride's funds. The office mentions among its applicants, numbering 3,838, 2 princes, 60 counts, 170 barons, 260 landed proprietors, 800 army officers, 618 professors and office holders, 74 savants and artists, 118 manufacturers, 740 merchants, 295 farmers and 1,200 professional men. It would be gratifying to know how many matches are made, but as this information is withheld, although the matrimonial bureau claims that its success has exceeded its most sanguine expectations.

TUTT'S PILLS!

A NOTED DIVINE SAYS
THEY ARE WORTH THEIR WEIGHT in GOLD
READ WHAT HE SAYS:

DR. TUTT:—Dear Sir: For ten years I have been a martyr to Dyspepsia, Constipation and Piles. Last Spring your Pills were recommended to me; I used them (but with little faith). I am now a well man, have good appetite, digestion perfect, regular stools, piles gone, and I have gained forty pounds solid flesh. They are worth their weight in gold.

REV. R. L. SIMPSON, Louisville, Ky.

A TORPID LIVER

is the fruitful source of many diseases, such as Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Costiveness, Dysentery, Bilious Fever, Ague and Fever, Jaundice, Piles, Rheumatism, Kidney Complaint, Colic, etc.

Tutt's Pills exert a powerful influence on the Liver, and will with certainty relieve that important organ from disease, and restore its normal functions.

The rapidity with which persons take on flesh, while under the influence of these pills, of itself indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system.

CONSTIPATION.

Only with regularity of the bowels can perfect health be enjoyed. When the constipation is of recent date, a single dose of TUTT'S PILLS will suffice, but if it has become habitual, one pill should be taken every night, gradually lessening the frequency of the dose until a regular daily movement is obtained, which will soon follow.

Sold Everywhere, 25 Cents.

THE GENUINE

DR. C. McLANE'S

CELEBRATED

FOR THE CURE OF

Hepatitis, or Liver Complaint,

DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increases on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to, or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them a FAIR TRIAL.

For all bilious derangements, and as a simple purgative, they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Every box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

The genuine McLANE'S LIVER PILLS bear the signatures of C. McLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrappers.

Insist upon having the genuine DR. C. McLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

TUTT'S PILLS!
A NOTED DIVINE SAYS
THEY ARE WORTH THEIR WEIGHT in GOLD
READ WHAT HE SAYS:
DR. TUTT:—Dear Sir: For ten years I have been a martyr to Dyspepsia, Constipation and Piles. Last Spring your Pills were recommended to me; I used them (but with little faith). I am now a well man, have good appetite, digestion perfect, regular stools, piles gone, and I have gained forty pounds solid flesh. They are worth their weight in gold.
REV. R. L. SIMPSON, Louisville, Ky.
A TORPID LIVER
is the fruitful source of many diseases, such as Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Costiveness, Dysentery, Bilious Fever, Ague and Fever, Jaundice, Piles, Rheumatism, Kidney Complaint, Colic, etc.
Tutt's Pills exert a powerful influence on the Liver, and will with certainty relieve that important organ from disease, and restore its normal functions.
The rapidity with which persons take on flesh, while under the influence of these pills, of itself indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system.
CONSTIPATION.
Only with regularity of the bowels can perfect health be enjoyed. When the constipation is of recent date, a single dose of TUTT'S PILLS will suffice, but if it has become habitual, one pill should be taken every night, gradually lessening the frequency of the dose until a regular daily movement is obtained, which will soon follow.

1880.

Hendricks or Tilden.

(Ft. Wayne Sentinel.)

The presidential election of 1880 is likely to be one of the most eventful in our history. It will bring to a direct issue democratic and monarchical principles in our government. The democratic party will stand, as it has ever stood, the representative of democratic and constitutional principles in the state and federal government; the republican party, in the candidacy of Grant, which seems inevitable, will represent the principle of personal government, one man power, military chieftainship, symbolized in the now often approvingly used term, and often seen picture of "the man on horseback." There is no evading this issue, and it addresses itself to the earnest thought of every patriotic citizen. A third term for Grant, means a perpetuation of personal power in American government. It means strong government, or coercion, as distinguished from constitutional democratic government, or government by free consent. Is such to be the end of our century of experiment with constitutional government on this continent? I hope not; but the true answer must be given by the people themselves.

As a democrat, I was opposed to the presidential nomination made at St. Louis in 1876. The democratic party has blundered in many things in the last eighteen or twenty years, but never more than when it put forward Samuel J. Tilden as its incarnation of democratic principles and of reform in governmental administration.

In June, 1876, just prior to the St. Louis convention, I said a few words in the Sentinel on this subject, the drift of which was, that in Horatio Seymour, of New York, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, the democratic party would find true and able and worthy representatives for president and vice president. I deprecated then, as I do now, the idea of placing a man of Mr. Tilden's stamp before the people as the one man, above all others in the democratic party, fitted for and worthy of its highest office and honors. He had no record to give him such a place. There was nothing in his character or public service to entitle him to it. The history of the election of 1876, and what has since followed it, is known to the country. Will the democratic party profit by it or not?

Four important publications have, within a few days past, attracted my attention, and will doubtless attract public attention First, an elaborate publication in the New York Times, of testimony it has gathered to prove that Gen. Grant is to be the republican, and Mr. Tilden the democratic candidate for president in 1880. Second, an interview with Horatio Seymour, published in the New York Sun, showing beyond further question, that eminent man, admonished by advancing age and ill health that his power for usefulness in public office has well nigh passed, will not be again a candidate for public office. Third, the publication in the New York World, of an interview at Fort Wayne, with Gov. Hendricks, showing his firm purpose not to sacrifice his personal dignity and self-respect, and the consideration justly due to the state, which has long honored him, by again taking the second place to Samuel J. Tilden as a candidate for the suffrages of the American people. Fourth, Mr. Tilden's telegram, of April 8th, to a Tilden Club in Pittsburgh, virtually proclaiming his candidacy, as the representative alike of civil reform and a personal grievance.

The issue is thus made for the democratic party, of Hendricks or Tilden—which shall it be?

I honor Gov. Hendricks for his manly utterance as to his own candidacy. There are many among his best friends, who, while they respect his magnanimity and patriotism in 1876, were yet pained at the seeming necessity which then gave him a subordinate place to Mr. Tilden. No such self-abnegation is now called for on Mr. Hendricks' part. He has won his right to a first place, if any, in the next presidential campaign. Shall he have it, or will the democratic party, and especially the democratic party of Indiana, again blunder by permitting Mr. Tilden, aided by his clan of New York politicians and his sinister methods, to foist himself upon the party for the second time as its candidate for the presidency? If the democratic press and party of Indiana are true to Mr. Hendricks, and to the public welfare, let them show it by earnest words and works. Something more is necessary to success in 1880 than Mr. Tilden's famed "power of organization," or the influence of his supposed wealth. Mr. Tilden's manhood and capacity, and I may say his statesmanship, were tested and found wanting when he failed to obtain by constitutional means the office to which he claimed, and his party believed, he was elected. A strong man, worthy of the confidence and leadership of a powerful majority in the nation, would have claimed and secured his right—a weak man would loose it by indecision and delay, and faith in devious secret plots, in which only subordinate and unscrupulous men would consent to take part.

It is plain enough that while the republican party desire and expect Grant to be their candidate, they also desire that Tilden shall be his opponent. The republican press is busy in making public sentiment in that direction. Why? Simply because they fear Tilden less than any other prominent democrat. They know his physical infirmities, his moral weakness, and his tarnished record—in a word, all his vulnerable points, and in answer to his oft-repeated cry of "Reform" and "Fraud," they point derisively to his abortive effort to obtain an electoral vote from Oregon, and to the cipher telegrams of his chosen friends and agents, revealing at least their complicity, if not his, in an effort to buy for Mr. Tilden for money a title to the presidency. Can the democratic party afford to go into the campaign of 1880 with such a brand upon its candidate—with such a burden to carry? It is claimed that Mr. Tilden's personal grievance, in his exclusion from the presidency by the award of the electoral commission, will be his strength in a second candidacy. The democratic party is not called upon to remedy Mr. Tilden's private wrongs, but rather to vindicate the constitutional rights of the states and the people to free and honest elections and to their lawful results. When the democratic party accepted the electoral commission, it was stopped forever from disputing the title of Hayes to his office, and Mr. Tilden's personal rights on the question were justly left to his own vindication, as he saw fit. Gov. Hendricks has accepted the situation with dignity, wisely saying: "The rebuke of 1880 should be administered to the wrong done to the people of the United States, rather than to individuals and the party." Mr. Tilden continues to mourn over his lost office and refuses to be comforted, except with another election. When prominent democrats of New York openly declare, what intelligent men know to be true, that "the state of New York has had enough of Mr. Tilden," it is well for the democracy of Indiana and the United States to say the same thing, before a presidential election repudiating Mr. Tilden, shall demonstrate the unwisdom of his second nomination.

The subject will justify further remark, but I will reserve it for another occasion. J. K. E.

How to Make a Fire.

(Indiana Farmer.)

I am surprised sometimes when I see women cooking or ironing and the fire won't burn; they punch and complain, and wonder why it is. If women were observing they would soon find out. In baking it is well to have the sticks in the stove placed so that they lie level, one end no higher than the other. But for boiling the tea-kettle merely, or the coffee-pot, when only a little fire is wanted, the wood should be the highest under that one place. So in heating the irons; there is no need of a fire under the whole front of the stove; let it be at one side. Some girls will pile on the wood when they go to boil the kettle or fry a couple of eggs, while a handful of sticks or cobs, or dry chips under one plate would suffice, and would hasten the work most admirably. But we must all learn by experience, I suppose. Sometimes I feel sorry when a man is in a hurry to get to the field or barn or office, and hurries his wife, and she never learned to build a quick, hot fire. Too often both get out of humor and say unkind things and are unhappy all day, just because of this lack of the commonest practical knowledge.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sincerity of the Press.

There are, indeed, two kinds of modern journals. The newspaper not only furnishes the news, but comments upon it. The editorial column is a kind of lay pulpit, from which political and literary and social and scientific discourses are preached. It has consequently become a public mentor. But all mentors are of two kinds. Those that personally attend young gentlemen on the grand tour either seek to show them what is most interesting, and to use every opportunity to the utmost advantage, or they are mere panders to the whims and passions of their pupils. It is so with journals. There is one class which aims to control public opinion, and another which is satisfied to reflect it. Yet neither properly sacrifices independence. The latter does not pretend to independence. It studies the weather-cock and guesses how the wind is going to blow, and speaks accordingly. The former speaks its convictions, but its convictions are the bond of sympathy between its readers and itself. Its sincerity is the secret of its success. Mr. Greeley in founding and conducting a great paper to prosperity sacrificed no conviction, and retained his independence. He was, in fact, his paper, and no paper was more a teacher and a leader. The principle of the London Times, on the other hand, is understood to be mere reflection of the current opinion for the moment. Whoever is king, the Times will be Vicar of Bray. In both these instances the conductors of the papers honestly do what they propose to do, and as an editor is in no more danger of compromising his independence than a clergyman, he is no more in that danger than any other member of a sect or a party. Doubtless, with all men, he is tempted to swim with the current. The men who are not swayed by interest, by prejudice, by tradition, by sophistry, by the love of ease and the comfort of conformity, are very few. But the conduct of a newspaper offers no especial trial to independence, unless a man begins by selling himself to teach and advocate and enforce what he does not believe. There are such soldiers of fortune, the Viscontis, the Sforzas, the Malatestas, of the press. They have no other conviction than that of the necessity of making a living, and of buying the success that is counted in money.—Editor's Easy Chair, in Harper's Magazine for May.

Anti-Tilden.

New York, April 23.—The Star says: Tilden didn't Tammany last night. The result of the election for Sachem was: Tammany, 524, and anti-Tammany, 4. If there is a democrat in the United States who believes Tilden has the ghost of a chance to carry New York as the standard bearer of 1880, let him weigh carefully the events of last night at the old wigwam, and break the chain of his delusion.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

Myron A. Buel, convicted of a most foul murder, his victim being a young girl, was hanged at Cooperstown, N. Y., last week.

A tug-boat was run down by a propeller in the East river, at New York, last week, and five men drowned.

The committee of citizens of New York who have been considering the project of a world's fair in that city in 1883, have agreed upon the site of the proposed exhibition.

Albert Deffarge, a New York druggist, crazed with jealousy, poisoned his child and then committed suicide by taking poison.

THE WEST.

The steamship Great Republic was recently wrecked on the Pacific coast while attempting to enter the harbor of Astoria, Oregon, during a dark night. Ten of the crew were drowned in departing from the wrecked vessel by the capsizing of a boat.

The Sunday News, of Cincinnati, published an article reflecting severely upon the character of Judge Taft, ex-Attorney General of the United States. Judge Taft's two sons, Charles and William, met the editor of the paper, Lester A. Rose, on the street, and Charles kept the crowd back while William beat Rose so badly that he had to be carried home.

The town of Eureka, Nev., has been nearly destroyed by fire. The total loss is about $1,000,000, on which there is an insurance of only $125,000.

Chicago elevators contain 6,677,969 bushels of wheat, 2,751,307 bushels of corn, 362,795 bushels of oats, 288,035 bushels of rye, and 432,594 bushels of barley, making a total of 10,486,906 bushels, against 3,140,826 bushels at this period last year.

Notre Dame, the famous Catholic University at South Bend, Ind., has been destroyed by fire. The total loss is about $300,000; insurance, $60,000. The students have been sent to their homes, and the buildings will be replaced at once.... Lieut. Seder, with fourteen men of the Seventh infantry, assisted by six friendly Indians, recently attacked a band of hostile Sioux in Northern Montana, and after a fierce fight put them to flight. Eight of the Sioux were killed and several wounded. On the other side, one friendly Indian was killed and another wounded.

A sensational scene, and one not down in the bill, was enacted in McVicker's Theater, at Chicago, the other evening. Shakspeare's historical play of Richard II. was being enacted, the well-known tragedian, Edwin Booth, personating Richard. The third act had been reached, and Mr. Booth was seated on the stage delivering the lines of the immortal bard, when a man arose in the audience and deliberately fired two pistol-shots at the actor. Fortunately, the would-be assassin was a poor shot and the bullets went wide of the intended mark. The episode created the wildest excitement among actors and audience; but, after a brief intermission, the play went on and was carried to its conclusion. The shooter was arrested and gave the name of Mark Gray, and his residence Keokuk, Iowa. He admitted the shooting, and expressed regret that he had not aimed more accurately. It is suspected that the man is crazy.

THE SOUTH.

A number of prominent colored men in St. Louis have organized a society called the Colored Immigration Aid Association, and elected J. Milton Turner President. Its object is to raise funds for the establishment of colonies, and to aid the emigration of colored men from Southern States to other sections of the Union.

The Tennessee moonshiners, to the number of 700, have concluded to accept the clemency extended by Attorney General Devens, and make no defense to the prosecutions.... The Louisiana Constitutional Convention met at New Orleans on the 21st of April.

A convention of colored people has just been held in New Orleans. A report was adopted stating that "an emigration society was organized in the parish of Caddo, in August, 1874, which rapidly spread through the State, and now numbers on the rolls 928,000 names of men, women and children. Sixty-nine thousand are residents of Louisiana. The cause of this emigration is the fact that negroes are charged a rental of $10 an acre for land, $40 per annum for the hire of a mule, 20 cents per pound for pork, and that these payments are secured by a lien on the crops. Life in Louisiana under these circumstances simply means perpetual debt or starvation, and hence they have concluded to leave the State and appeal to the country to assist them in their exodus."

A Charleston (S. C.) dispatch says that ex-Treasurer Cardozo and ex-Congressman Smalls, convicted of bribery, have been pardoned by Gov. Simpson.

GENERAL.

In Chicago the Booth season at McVicker's Theater is delighting the press and public, all his representations being given with an excellence of mounting and support which calls for the highest praise. The great tragedian himself has lost none of the elements that have given him the topmost round of the ladder of histrionic fame. This week Bulwer's "Richelieu," the "Richard II." of Shakspeare, and Tom Taylor's "Fool's Revenge," are billed.

The death of Gen. John A. Dix occurred at his residence in New York city on the 21st of April. Gen. Dix was born in Boscawen, N. H., July 24, 1798. He entered the army in 1812, but resigned in 1828, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. In 1842 he was elected to the New York Assembly; in 1845 was made Senator in Congress for the unexpired term of Silas Wright; in 1852, was appointed Assistant Treasurer of the United States in New York city, and in 1859 was made Postmaster. In December, 1860, he was appointed President Buchanan's Secretary of the Treasury in place of Howell Cobb. In May, 1861, he was commissioned Major General of United States volunteers, and subsequently received the same rank in the regular army. He was appointed Minister to Paris in 1866, and in 1872 elected Governor of New York. He was again nominated in 1874, and defeated by Tilden. This ended his political career. He has contributed to a number of journals and published several works. Of late he has lived in retirement.

April returns to the Department of Agriculture, at Washington, show that the acreage of winter wheat is about 1½ per cent greater than last year. The wheat in the ground, taken as a whole, is about 2 per cent below the average. The crop in some sections was unfavorably affected by a fall drought, and in others by the absence of snow during the extreme winter cold. With average growing conditions, however, it will make a very large crop of winter wheat. Rye has fallen off about 4 per cent in acreage, and is about 4 per cent below the average.

Work on the Vanderbilt railroad tunnel under the Detroit river, at Grosse Isle, began last week, both in Michigan and in Canada.

WASHINGTON.

Notice is given by the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government has no more 4-per-cent bonds to sell at present, the enormous subscription of the New York syndicate having absorbed all that remained of that issue required for the refunding of redeemable ten-forties. The latter are also all called in. Hereafter the refunding $10 certificates will be sold at the treasury and sub-treasuries only, and not in larger sums than $100 at one time.

Chief Moses and the other Indians called at the Executive Mansion the other day and were presented to the President, who said to them: "I am glad to see you, my friends. I hope Secretary Schurz will make a settlement with you that shall be satisfactory. We are friendly toward you, and want to deal with you with exact justice. I hope you will always be our friends."

During March, 1879, the United States exported provisions, bacon, hams, beef, pork, lard, butter, cheese and tallow valued at $11,036,125, a decrease of $1,473,309 from the exports of the articles in March, 1878.

The first treasury warrant for the payment of arrears of pensions was signed April 22, and it is believed back pensions can be paid as rapidly as the accounts are made up, at the rate of $1,500,000 a month.

It has been decided by the Court of Claims that the pensions of inmates of the Soldiers' Homes belong to them individually, just as if they were outside of the institutions. Heretofore, while an ex-soldier remained in one of these institutions, the officials have drawn his pension and applied it to the support of the home.

FOREIGN.

The Russian Government, in its attempt to crush out the Nihilists, is adopting the most vigorous and far-reaching measures. In most of the populous districts a Governor General has been appointed whose powers exceed those of a General in time of war. Ten thousand or more persons are now under arrest, and it is thought that most of these prisoners will eventually take up their residence in Siberia.

A dispatch from Bombay says the King of Burmah has declared to his counselors that fear had heretofore made him yield to the British demands, but henceforth he would neither listen to nor speak of proposals for an accommodation with England.

Gen. Gourko, the new Governor General of St. Petersburg, has taken the most extraordinary precautions to frustrate any schemes which the Nihilists may concoct. All the gunholders in the city have been notified to make full and true returns of the stocks severally held by them, and they are, moreover, forbidden to sell to any person unless authorized so to do by special permission from the authorities.

The American horse Parole, owned by Mr. Pierre Lorillard, of New York, has won the city and suburban handicap at Epsom. This is the second race won by Parole on the English turf within a few days.

The news from South Africa is that Col. Pearson, who had been so long surrounded by an army of hostile Zulus at Ekowe, has been relieved after severe fighting. Two battles were fought, in which the British lost about 500 men, while the Zulu loss is placed at 2,800.

A third brilliant victory has been scored by the American horse Parole in England, by winning the great Metropolitan Stakes at Epsom. A cable dispatch says of the race: Castlereagh was the only other entry that faced the starter. Castlereagh carried 110 pounds; Parole, 124. F. Archer rode Parole and Platt was on the back of Castlereagh. Castlereagh made the running, and a magnificent contest ensued, and it was apparently either horse's race when they were passing the Tottenham course down to the grand stand. In this exciting state of the contest, Archer called on Parole for an effort, and the gallant gelding nobly responded, and, putting forward a wondrous effort, passed the judge's chair ahead of Castlereagh.

Russian items: Lieut. Dubrovin has been arrested near Novgorod, suspected of being one of the chief members of the Revolutionary Committee. The assassination of another spy, who betrayed the whereabouts of the secret printing office at Toprovo, is reported. The Czar, who, until lately, drove out unattended, now has his carriage surrounded by Cossacks. A High Court of Criminal Justice, under the Presidency of the Grand Duke Constantine, brother of the Czar, has been appointed for the trial of Solovieff, who attempted the assassination of the Czar.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

Messrs. Randolph, of New Jersey, and Groome, of Maryland (Democrats) addressed the Senate on the 18th in support of the political amendments to the Army bill.—In the House, the Legislative Appropriation bill being under discussion, Mr. McKinley (Republican), of Ohio, spoke in opposition to the proposed repeal of the general Election laws. He denounced the legislation as a bold and wanton attempt to wipe from the law every protection of the ballot box, and to surrender it into the unholy hands of hired "repeaters" and ballot-box stuffers at the North, and of tissue-ballot-cheats at the South. Mr. Burrows (Republican), of Michigan, was the next speaker. He said that if gentlemen on the other side were really anxious to preserve peace and the purity of elections, they would be the last to attempt to tear down the only remaining national fortress reared for that purpose. Did they desire an honest registration? These laws provided it. Did they want a pure ballot? These laws secured it. Did they want a fair count? These laws insured it. Did they want true returns? These laws enjoined it. Did they want peace and order at the polls? These laws commanded it. There was nothing in those laws that was a terror to any man save one who had committed or was meditating an attack on the purity of elections. Mr. Cofroth (Democrat), of Indiana, said that an honest election and a fair election, where the voter could deposit his vote untrammeled and unawed, was the palladium of American liberty. The teaching of statesmen, from the earliest history down until the Republican party had come into power, had been an unbroken declaration that the Federal power had no authority to interfere in elections, but that each State should regulate the manner of holding its elections. He maintained that the ballot was the weapon with which a freeman was to protect his personal liberty and his civil rights. The gentleman from Ohio (Garfield) had sounded the war tocsin and waved the "bloody shirt," and the whole camp had danced. On hearing the bitter denunciation from the other side, he had ventured to look over there, and he had been delighted to see that his Republican friends were not actually enraged, but were as peaceful and pleasant in appearance as a May morning. Mr. Dickey (Democrat), of Ohio, said the issue was squarely made, the parties were squarely divided, and the question was whether these objectionable laws should be repealed. To that question the Democratic party here and the Democratic party throughout the nation answered, "Yes!" The constitution required it, the freedom of elections and the liberties of the people demanded it.

The Senate was not in session on the 19th.—In the House, Mr. Price, of Iowa, made a speech against the repeal of the Election laws. The bill to provide for the exchange of subsidiary silver coin for legal-tender money was discussed. Mr. De La Matyr filed a petition embodying a bill to establish "greenback currency," and to relieve the financial distress of the country by granting aid to certain companies incorporated by State authority for works of internal improvement. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be required to have prepared notes and obligations of the United States to the aggregate of $1,000,000,000, to be known as "greenback currency," for general circulation, the amounts and form as the bill provides, which notes or obligations shall constitute a legal tender for all debts and demands due to all United States Government dues.

The Senate resumed consideration of the Army Appropriation bill on the 21st. Mr. Bayard took the floor and defended the incorporation of general legislation in Appropriation bills, there being nothing unusual in it; hence the cry of "revolution" was unsubstantial and foolish, and the people would condemn it. He condemned all conduct which would tend to prevent the restoration of full confidence and friendship in all parts of the country. He was well assured that the hostility of one section against the other would speedily lead to depression and degradation, and ultimately ruin both, and, in conclusion, expressed his confidence that the American people would support the majority in their present legislation, as it was in the direction of justice, and had for its object the protection of the liberties of the people. Mr. Maxey followed Mr. Bayard in a speech strongly advocating the repeal of the Election laws.—In the House, a perfect avalanche of bills was introduced, the total number being 1,385, the largest number, by all odds, ever before introduced in Congress in one day. The following are among the most important ones: To provide for reviving the Alabama Claims Court; to provide for the distribution of the Geneva award fund; to extend the time for the completion of the Northern Pacific railroad; to retire trade dollars; to increase the volume of currency; to appoint a National Board of Railroad Commissioners; to prohibit the further increase of the interest-paying debt; to enforce the observance of the Eight-Hour law; to pay all Government workmen an increase of wages where they work over eight hours per day; to establish boards of assistants in the navy; to reorganize the army; to amend the law relating to the reimbursing of States for money spent in equipping troops during the war; to amend the Postal laws; to provide for the taxing of incomes.

The Army bill was further debated in the Senate on the 22d. The first speech was delivered by Mr. Garland, of Arkansas. After discussing at length the legal aspect of the questions at issue, he passed to the question of the propriety of attaching the proposed repeal to an Appropriation bill. Mr. Garland said the practice was an old one, and, whatever its faults, it could not be uprooted save by a constitutional amendment. He reviewed some of the notable instances of similar action by Republican majorities, and said the cry of revolution was raised too late to be sincere. He alluded to Mr. Blaine's enumeration of the consequences of a failure to provide for the expenses of the Government, and declared, rather than see the liberties of the humblest citizen longer abridged by law, which it was in the power of Congress to repeal, he would see the Capitol crumble to pieces, the ships rot at their moorings, and the Supreme Court unfrocked. Mr. Davis, of Illinois, spoke next. He said the sixth section of the Appropriation bill proposes to strike from both sections the words "or to keep peace at the polls," and nothing more; so that the army cannot be used hereafter at elections for any purpose. As an abstract proposition, could there be any rational objection to this? Ought the army to be used at the polls when there has been profound peace for more than a decade? Does any one believe that such a law would ever have received the approval of the American Congress if it had been brought forward in time of peace. The charge that this is revolutionary legislation has no force. It might be called a partisan device. Congress has power under the constitution to raise and equip armies, and the House of Representatives hold the purse-strings. The amendment is germane to the bill, and is simply a condition as to the use of the army, which the people's representatives had a perfect right to impose. It is not in any proper sense general legislation, and if it was the statute-books are full of precedents that the friends of the present measure might cite against their opponents. Mr. Allison, of Iowa, followed Mr. Davis. He believed it was revolutionary to force an amendment of the constitution without ordinary processes. The constitution says that bills shall be passed by both houses and receive the signature of the President in order to become law, yet it was now proposed to make the President's signature a condition to the appropriation of money to defray the Government expenses. Gen. Jackson would have been amazed at such presumption. He read from Jackson's message to the Senate in 1834 protesting against a resolution passed by that body to the effect that the President had acted outside of his constitutional perogatives, and saying that if such interference with the independence of the Executive was allowed to pass unnoticed, and grew into a custom, it would be as effective in destroying liberty of action in the independent departments of the Government as if a constitutional amendment were adopted throwing into the hands of the President the power delegated to the Senate.—The House passed Mr. Stephens' bill to provide for an interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20. There was a sharp debate over the political amendments to the Legislative bill, but the guns were of small caliber and made little noise.

There was a sharp discussion in the Senate, on the 23d, over the resolution to rescind the rule regarding the removal of Senate employes. An amendment proposed by Mr. Pendleton, that the employes shall be only retained so long as acceptable to a majority of the Senate, was adopted by a vote of 36 to 23. The debate on the Army bill was then resumed, and Messrs. Williams, of Kentucky, and Jones, of Florida, spoke in favor of the repeal of the Election laws, after which there was a sharp colloquy between Messrs. Blaine and Butler in regard to alleged charges of bulldozing and election frauds in the South. Mr. Blaine, in closing the debate, paid his respects to Mr. Davis, of Illinois. He denied to that Senator the right to carry the traditions and fame and glory of Abraham Lincoln into the Democratic camp. He might go there himself, and he might sit on that side of the Senate, where he was the only man that gave Lincoln a support. Had Lincoln lived, as the Senator said, some things might and others might not have happened. But the thing that had happened was that a Senator on this floor, elected by Democrats over a Union soldier, had spoken as a representative of Abraham Lincoln. The Senator had the right to go when and where he pleased. He had the right to address to the living what he chose, but he had no right to drag the greatest man of the last ten centuries into the mire of the party that he would have opposed to his death.—The House continued the discussion of the Legislative bill, Mr. Frye being the first speaker. He based his opposition to the repeal of the Federal Election laws chiefly on the good effect of their operation in the city of New York, where, he said, false registration, repeating, voting on names of dead men and convicts had been pretty effectually stopped by the enforcement of those laws. Mr. Robeson followed in a two hours' speech. His argument was that the power of the United States to make controlling regulations as to Federal elections in the States is constitutional; that in pursuance of that authority the Federal Election laws have been passed, and should not be repealed. Mr. Finley argued in favor of the proposed repeal. Though it was true special Marshals could only be appointed in cities of 20,000 and upward, still, under the decision of Attorney General Taft in 1876, Deputy Marshals to the number of 11,000 had been appointed in no less than 2,224 precincts. Of these 11,000 Deputy Marshals, 10,400 had been placed in strong Democratic or in doubtful precincts. Of the remaining 600, 388 had been stationed in Philadelphia, and he had it upon good authority that the greatest bulk of them had been stationed in Randall's district.

The discussion of the proposed repeal of the rule relating to Senate employes was continued in the Senate on the 24th, but no action was taken. The Army bill was then taken up, and Mr. Conkling addressed the Senate. He said there was a purpose on the part of the Democrats to stop the appropriations unless certain legislation is conceded. It was a plain duty of Congress to make appropriations to keep the Government alive, and a refusal to do so is revolutionary and treasonable. Thus far the achievements of the Democratic majority had been easy, but the trial was yet to come. It would be more difficult. The party had got themselves into a predicament, and unless the Executive led them out they would have to back out. They had been told that if the President refused to accept these bills with all their political excrescences, and yield to a majority, they will vacate their seats and leave the Government moneyless. If the majority should make such an attempt, he (Conkling) hoped and trusted they would be called back as soon as need be until they relinquished their monstrous pretension, and abandoned their treasonable position. Mr. Conkling spoke three hours, and his effort is pronounced by the Republicans the ablest yet delivered during the long debate. Several amendments were offered by the Republicans to the repealing clauses, all of which were voted down by the Democrats.—In the House, the day was devoted to the discussion of the Legislative bill, and quite a number of speeches were made. Mr. Gillette said that he did not consider that there was any pressing necessity for placing the proposed legislation on the Appropriation bills, and he should, therefore, vote to strike it out; but, if it were retained, he would vote for the passage of the bill, not with a view, however, of forcing Executive approval. Alluding to Republican rule in Louisiana he said that, according to what he had heard, [illegible] that hell must be better governed than Louisiana. He announced [illegible] anti-monopoly law, and declared that, before saying to the Chinese that they must go, he would say to every law on the statute-book which oppressed the laboring classes that it must go; the national banks must go; the national bonds must go; the land-monopolists must go; the mountains of idle money in the treasury must go into the channels of business; the millions absorbed by coin bonds must go out once more to make glad the hearts of the toilers. What people wanted was bread, not blood. Mr. De La Matyr spoke in the same vein. Down with the puerile cry of revolution, raised by those who had been [illegible] on one side or [illegible] on the other. He [illegible] attempt for it. The country wanted peace, not [illegible] opening of sectional strife. Mr. Hazelton denounced the Greenback representatives for the fal-de-roll in which they had been indulging. He said that they appeared to him to be prepared to stab the [illegible] Hazelton. [illegible] the attempt of the Republican party to [illegible] failed [illegible] the men of the South who had been brave enough to fight the battle, when they had laid down their arms [illegible] ways did, accepting the consequences of their defeat. [illegible] had knelt together at the feet of the Goddess of Liberty, [illegible] in gray, as they would always stand against any party or men who attempted to break down the bulwarks of civil liberty. The attempt of the Republican party was to stiffen the backbone of the President and force him to starve the army to death. It would be a fitting close to the Republican party in the executive branch of the Government for their President to signalize his last term by attempting to defeat the will of the people for the purpose of doing the will of his party. The result of the adroit knavery of that party had been to cheat the ballot-box of the fruits of its victory, and still the Republicans had cheek enough to talk about the purity of elections.

Frederick Eckert, of Baltimore announces his belief that there ought to be seven Books of Moses instead of five, and it is probable that, if glib-tongued and persuasive, he might have made converts under the enlarged Bible that he proposes to issue. But he rashly tested his claim to divine inspiration by attempting to perform a miracle. He exhumed the body of his dead wife, and commanded her to live again. His failure ended his career as a religious leader before it had more than begun. His mistake lay in acquiring faith in himself instead of merely inspiring it in others.

The Reason.

"Now, children," said a Sunday-school superintendent, who had been talking to his scholars about good people, "when I am walking in the street, I speak to some persons I meet, and I don't speak to others; and what's the reason?" He expected the reply would be, "Because some are good and others are bad," but, to his discomfiture, the general shout was, "Because some are rich and others are poor."

THE HOME DOCTOR.

Milk and White-lead Poisoning.—It is stated on the best French medical authority that the free use of milk in white-lead works is a preventive of lead poisoning or painter's colic.

Blisters.—A plaster composed of ground mustard, mixed with white of an egg in place of water, will prevent a blister on the surface of the skin. A salve for blisters is made as follows: Scrape two carrots and stew in two table-spoonfuls hog's lard. Add two plaintain leaves. When the carrots are [illegible] strain.

Cure for Chilblains.—Take a bucketful of water and make it as hot as it can be borne by the hand. Then put the feet in, and keep them there until the pain ceases, and the cure is complete. For burning and itching use some kind of oil. To three drops of linseed oil add one drop of creosote; bathe the feet in water as hot as it can be borne before applying the ointment. It often cures, with one application a day, in less than a week's time. But in some cases more time is required.

Cure for Rheumatism.—In addition to its usefulness as a sedative for the nerves, celery, when cooked, is excellent for rheumatism. Cut the celery into inch dice. Boil in water until soft. No water must be poured away unless drunk by the invalid. Then take new milk, slightly thicken with flour and flavor with nutmeg; warm with the celery in the saucepan; serve with diamonds of toasted bread around the dish and eat with potatoes. Cold or damp never produces rheumatism, but simply develops it. The acid blood is the primary cause and the sustaining power of evil. While the blood is alkaline there can be no rheumatism and equally no gout. Rheumatism is impossible on such a diet.

Cure for Felon.—When a finger pricks as though there were a thorn in it, and throbs intolerably when held downward, and yet there is no external sign of mischief, the probabilities are that a felon is in prospect. Go at once to the butcher's and procure some of the spinal marrow of a beef creature. Take a piece, say about two inches in length, and, having cut it open lengthwise, wrap it around the affected finger, covering, of course, with cloth. In a few hours change the piece of marrow for a fresh one, and continue to keep the finger so incased until all pain has ceased and there is no discomfort when the marrow is removed. The finger will look strangely white and porous, but the cure is complete. This remedy ought to become professional. It is vastly better than the surgeon's knife, and more effectual.

Faintness and Its Causes.

Faintness consists in a temporary failure of the activity of the heart; the blood, in consequence, is not properly circulated. It does not reach the head, and the patient loses clearness of vision and color, and, if not prevented, falls on the floor, where, however, or even before reaching it, he recovers. There is no convulsion, and, though he can scarcely be said to be conscious, he is not unconscious, so as not to be able to be aroused, as happens in epilepsy. There are all degrees of faintness, from merely feeling faint and looking slightly pale, to the state we have described; and in some cases the state of fainting is hardly recovered from well before it begins again and again, for hours and days together. We need hardly say that such cases as the latter are altogether beyond the reach of domestic medicine. What are the causes of faintness? It is not very difficult to describe these. Some people are so easily affected that they faint if they cut their finger, or even if they only see the cut finger of another. All one can say of such persons is that their muscular fiber is not strong, and that their nerves are sensitive. The heart, which goes on for years circulating the blood, is essentially a muscle. It is weak in some people, stronger in others. As a rule, it is weaker in women, and stronger in men. Hence women faint more rapidly than men. Whatever weakens the heart and muscles generally acts as a cause of faintness. Close, foul air is a common cause of faintness or of languidness. Anything which greatly affects the nervous system, such as bad news or the sight of something horrible or dissagreeable, will sometimes cause fainting. But, of all classes of fainting, none is so serious as the loss of blood. The muscles, in order to act well, must be supplied with the blood; and if the blood of the body is lost—if it escapes, from a vein open purposely, or from piles, or from the source from which menstruation proceeds—in excessive quantity, then faintness will happen. The degree of it will depend on the constitution, and on the amount of blood lost. A loss of blood that would scarcely be felt by one person will be a serious cause of faintness to another. Sometimes frequent faintness arises from becoming very fat, the muscular system of the heart being impaired by fat deposit.—Cassell's Household Guide.

The Land of Trust.

In Tokio, Yokohama, Nagasaki, Kanagawa, Hakodadi—in all cities and towns, whether big or little, at hotels, restaurants, shops, bar-rooms—credit is customary—so firmly fixed that it is hard to pay cash. When you buy anything, the clerk or salesman presents you with a chit—very much like a pad—on which you write the article, its price and your name, and the thing is repeated if you go to the same place a dozen times a day. In fact, you need no money for any ordinary purpose until the end of the month, when you liquidate your chits and begin over again. It is counted very dishonorable not to pay your chits. If you do not, your name is hung on the wall of the establishment where you are in debt, and you can get nothing more there. Still, in Japan, as in every quarter of the globe, there are persons, and not a few, who don't pay; and who, when shut out from one place, go to another and make fresh bills. The system is as bad as bad can be. Credit widely extended is an evil in any community. It hurts the man who gets it as well as the man who gives it. Its tendency always is to relax principle, to encourage extravagance, to dull sensibility, to weaken character. Hundreds, yes thousands, of persons in Japan to-day have lost the sense of integrity, and all ideas of financial promptness, who would not have done so but for this pernicious order of credit. The custom arose some years ago from the scarcity of small change, which rendered it really necessary. But now, although change is abundant, the custom continues, with no signs of disruption or decay. Tradesmen and everybody else suffer greatly by it, having, at the end of each year, a number of debts not only uncollected but uncollectible. Business never will be, and never can be, on any sound or desirable basis in Japan until a thorough reformation shall have been instituted. —Boston Herald.

A Prompt Man.

People never tire, says "Causeur" in the Transcript, of hearing stories of the late Col. Isaac O. Barnes, of this city, whilom United States Marshal of this district. He was a large man, fond of chatting with friends, and possessed withal a thin, piping, squeaky voice that was all his own. He disliked restraint of any kind, and was specially averse to religious services, chiefly because he had to keep silent while they lasted. He had an old friend—Mr. Kidder Marshall—to whom he was warmly attached, and when Mr. Marshall died felt it his duty to attend the funeral, which took place in Fitchburg. It was a hot, sticky day in summer, and the ride from Boston in the cars was anything but pleasant. Arrived at the house of the deceased friend, he found a large gathering in the parlor, which was warm and close. The Colonel wedged himself into an arm-chair several sizes too small for his ample person, settled himself as best he could, and "fidgeted." It so chanced that two clergymen conducted the services, which were so protracted that two hours had passed before the last "amen" had been said. In the midst of the solemn pause that followed it, Col. Barnes, who could "hold in" no longer, turned to the gentleman next him, and, in a voice pitched in a high key, said: "Did you know Kid?" "I did," said his fellow-mourner, in a deep, hushed voice. "He was a nice fellow, wasn't he?" piped Barnes. "He was," answered his neighbor, still in the same mournful tone. "Yes, and a mighty smart fellow, too," continued the Colonel, now giving his shrill voice free play, and wiping the beads from his forehead; "if he'd had the running of this funeral, he'd been under ground an hour and a half ago."

"Double" Stockings.

Delicate persons who object to taking cold, having found it impossible to wear the extremely thin "lace" stockings, a London manufacturer has introduced what he calls the "double" stocking. This is in two styles. One is so woven as to present a lace surface over a flesh-colored or rose-pink under-surface, and looks as if the stocking was drawn on over the limb. The designs shown in the upper surface are exceedingly handsome. The other style is an open check simulating the most superb lace, and is intended to be drawn over an under-stocking of flesh color or rose-pink. Warmth is thus secured. These stockings are in silk lace as well as in exquisitely fine Lisle-thread, and—as do all the new designs—they define the calf and instep, setting well in at the line above the heel, an important matter in the comfort of wearing a stocking.

A singular idea is carried out in the stockings embroidered in blue, pink, red and light-green, as well as lilac, gray, pearl and wood-color, over darker shades or contrasting colors. These expensive hose have gained greater popularity on account of the statements—false or true—as to the bad effect on the health of dyed hosiery. Wood-color on wood-color is a favorite in hose.

English newspapers very rarely contain in the obituary column a notice of a funeral, because, except in the case of an eminent public person, it is not desired that any but near relatives or very intimate friends should attend, and men worth a million go to their graves with less pomp and parade than a New York car-driver.

BAYONETS AT THE POLLS.

The Great Struggle for Free Elections.

Speech of Senator Wallace, of Pennsylvania.

The Army bill being under consideration in the United States Senate, Mr. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, spoke as follows:

This bill contains but a single disputed section. To that the Senator from Maine addressed himself; to that we address ourselves. There is but a single issue presented by this bill, to that I shall try to confine myself. All that hear me and the country know that the convulsive throes of a great people in a tremendous civil war have caused many departures from those vital principles that lie at the base of all civil liberty. The history of our race and the precedents of the past point them out as essential elements in the preservation of our own freedom, and its most earnest struggles ever have been and ever will be made for their safety. The necessities of the hour may cause a free people to bear for a time the subjection of the civil to the military power, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus or the presence of armed troops at election polls, but these must pass away with the necessity that gave them birth. They can never be crystallized upon the necks of Anglo-Saxons.

The single issue involved in this bill is, shall the executive arm of the Government longer possess the power to place troops at the election polls? Their presence there or the power to place them there is equally a menace to the people and a departure from the right of free elections. That is the issue, the sole, the only issue that is in this bill. We make no other; we will be diverted not from this.

The mere presence of armed troops at the polls is a menace to individual liberty. The shadow of the power of armed men is in itself a threat, and no free people will bear it. It was one of the struggles between Charles I. and his first three Parliaments that he should yield to them the right he claimed to quarter troops upon the people. Parliament refused to give him the money and he was accustomed to send troops into the country districts and compel them to be quartered and supported by the people without authority of law. The Commons placed it in their bills; they formulated and crystallized it in the petition of right, and they made the King yield to their just demands in behalf of the people. This right and privilege is registered in the bill of rights of nearly every constitution in all this land. The power to quarter troops upon the people was wrung from the Kingly power of Great Britain by placing it upon bills under which he was voted supplies to carry on a war for the Palatinate with Spain. Before they would yield him those supplies they compelled him to agree to a concession of this great right, and the right to be free from such intrusion became fixed and certain. The correlative right in regard to free election and the absence of troops from the polls is found still further back in English history. The menace of armed troops at the polls was prohibited by a statute in the reign of George II., and it recites the existence of the right to be free from this menace as old as the time of Edward I. In the thirteenth century, nearly 600 years ago, the race from whom we obtain our liberty and law, from whose loins we mainly sprung, asserted the doctrine that this right of free election belonged to the people and ought not to be jeopardized. It was a right wrung, absolutely wrung, from the hand of power in the time of Edward I. It was resurrected in the time of George II., and then enacted into law in 1735. Let us see what was done. I shall not read the statute. A law was passed in 1735 which forbade the presence of armed troops within two miles of the election polls. Subsequently, in 1741, the executive power (forgetting the existence of this statute) and—

"During the corrupt administration of Sir Robert Walpole, at an election held for the city of Westminster, under an order signed by three magistrates of the county, a body of armed soldiers was marched up and stationed in the churchyard of Saint Paul, Covent Garden, in the vicinity of the poll; and, on this being shown to the House of Commons, they passed a resolution affirming 'that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament, is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom.' The High Bailiff was taken into custody by order of the House, and the three magistrates who signed the order were brought to the bar and reprimanded by the Speaker, upon their knees, as the House had directed; and, after this, the House passed a vote of thanks to the Speaker for his reprimand of the delinquents, and directed the same to be printed."—Brightly's Leading Cases on Elections, 603, 604.

Sir, this right, thus vindicated, is a part of our system. These privileges are a part of our own free liberties. They come to us with the system of laws under which we live. They belong to us as an integral part of our system of free elections, and we would be false to our highest duty if we should fail to protect them and assert their existence. I now quote from McCrary on Elections, section 418. He says:

"There can, however, be no doubt but that the law looks with great disfavor upon anything like an interference by the military with the freedom of an election. An armed force in the neighborhood of the polls is almost of necessity a menace to the voters, and an interference with their freedom and independence, and, if such armed force be in the hands of or under the control of the partisan friends of any particular candidate or set of candidates, the probability of an improper influence becomes still stronger."

This proposition does not stand alone on the thought of taking out of this section the authority for the presence of armed troops at the polls under Federal law, but it goes beyond this and finds its reason and its root in the right of the States to control this subject entirely. The control of free elections, the guarantee for their existence, does not belong to the Federal Government; it belongs to the States themselves and always has belonged there. The constitution of almost every State in this country contains in its bill of rights a guarantee of free elections. The States controlled the franchise. With them, both before and since the formation of the constitution, was vested the power and the right to guard the purity and the freedom of elections.

Let the Senators from New England and the Senators from the great West, and the Senators from the Middle States and the South take up the bills of rights of their respective States and see what is guaranteed. In nearly all of them the guarantee is that all elections shall be free. Here is the crystallization of the doctrine that comes to us from the time of Edward I., which found voice in the time of Charles I. and George II., and is now one of the privileges and rights of this people. In Pennsylvania, as long since as 1805, its rulers enacted this statute:

"No body of troops, being regularly employed in the army of the United States or of this State, shall appear and be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this State, during the time of said election."

This wholesome provision was re-enacted in 1839, and it is now a part of the law of that Commonwealth. The enactment of this followed the time of the Alien and Sedition law. The necessity had come for the people to enact it. Jefferson was in power here, his party was in control in that great State, and public sentiment found vent in the statute that protected at the polls the citizens from armed interference or control in any way by Federal or other troops. New York crystallized this right in her statutes as early as 1818, and prohibited the military from appearing or exercising on election day, or during ten days preceding it; and the same is the law in Wisconsin. Massachusetts, Maine, New Jersey, [illegible] forbid their military [illegible] on election day, and imposed penalties for its violation. Virginia, by her constitution, exempted the voter from military service on election day, and denied the franchise to every non-commissioned officer and private in the United States army or seaman or marine in the United States navy, while Maryland prescribed that no officer should muster or march any troops within view of the polls on election day.

I take the constitution of Pennsylvania of 1873 and I read from the bill of rights:

"Elections shall be free and equal; and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the rights of suffrage."

This is reproduced, too, in the constitutions of Colorado and Missouri, enacted since, almost in word and letter.

But, sir, the Federal constitution has not a syllable on that subject. Neither in its main nor in the original amendments which secured the liberties of the people is there a word upon the subject of free elections. The Federal Government has no control over the subject; and they did not attempt to assert any such right in reference to it. The control of elections and the guarantee for them belonged to the States; there it was vested and there it is to remain. Prior to 1864 the only attempt at its control here was when John Marshall, in the House of Representatives, in the year 1800, under the elder Adams, reported a statute giving to the Federal Government control of elections so far as to prevent armed interference at the polls; but when the measure came to the Senate it was defeated. It failed because the Federal Government had no control over it. There was no dream, no thought of exercising this right by the Federal Government until it was done under the war power in the border States in 1862-'63-'64. Troops were then placed at the polls for the alleged protection of what was claimed to be the rights of so-called loyal men there. The first exercise of this right by the Federal Government was under the war power. It did not come from any grant from the people or the States, but solely and exclusively from what was claimed as a war power, and, like many others of the same character, force was its essential element. To escape from this and to restore to their people that which they had never parted from with their own consent, the act of 1865 was introduced at the close of the war by Senator Powell, of Kentucky. In its original form it gave security from intrusion, and re-enacted what was the undoubted law of every State. It was not permitted to pass until it was amended by Republican Senators by the insertion of the words that are now proposed to be taken out, and the guarantee of free elections claimed from the Federal Government thus became a means for intruding its mailed hand at the polls. Nothing but the abnormal condition of the country in 1865 and since could have produced the excrescence that we now propose to remove.

The bill as originally introduced—I have it before me—had no words authorizing troops to be present either to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls. As introduced, the bill was a guarantee of the right that existed in the States, and a restriction upon the power of the Federal Government, which was then being used wrongfully and oppressively upon the people of the border States. The bill was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, a Republican committee. It slumbered there for a number of months, and then came back with a report by Mr. Howard with a negative recommendation. He held that the right to exercise the war power of 1864 to prevent men who were not loyal from voting was a just and proper exercise of power. Senator Powell, desiring to relieve his people from wrongful oppression, pressed the bill again and again, until in June, 1864, it was put upon its passage, and he agreed to the amendment that troops might be used to repel the armed enemies of the United States. This was adopted without dissent.

Then Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, a Republican Senator, moved to add the words "or to keep peace at the polls." Upon that amendment the yeas and nays were called. Every "yea" vote was given by a Republican and every Democrat voted "nay." Reverdy Johnson, John P. Hale, and Senator Hicks, of Maryland, voted with the Democrats. This provision which is now proposed to be eliminated, "or keep peace at the polls," was adopted by a vote of sixteen Republicans against fifteen Democrats and others. Then the question came upon the passage of the bill thus amended, and the Senator from Kentucky, desiring to protect his people, was willing to take anything to save them from the pressure that was upon them, and accepted the bill in that form; but even then they were scarcely willing to pass it. Nowhere else in all the history of this Government had this claim of power appeared. Here, and here alone, is the only instance of the iron-clad arm of the Federal power appearing at the ballot-box.

We are done with the abnormal condition that came from the war. This people ask to be restored to their normal rights, whether it be in the North or in the South. Just here I will tell the Senator from Maine that at the election in 1860 for Governor of Pennsylvania, in the Third precinct of the Fifth ward of the city of Philadelphia, an armed body of marines were brought to the polls; that they took possession thereof and closed and kept them closed for an hour, until they saw fit to open them and permit those to vote whom they thought ought to vote. Sir, the mail-clad armor of the Federal Government has shown itself in Broad street, Philadelphia, within three years. The people of our State want no more of this. I speak for my people. They want free elections, without either the shadow or the substance of military power, either State or Federal. They want the very essence of the provisions of our own constitution recognized in practice as it is in truth, as the law of the land. I am here representing, so far as I can, that people in asking at the hands of the Senate of the United States that this menace, this threat, this assumption of right that does not belong to the Federal Government may be eliminated from her statutes and that the States and the people of the States may control this question as they ought and of right are entitled to do. In Mexico, even in poor, downtrodden Mexico, when our troops were at the City of Mexico in the war of 1846-'47, because there was a provision in their laws that troops should not be present at the polls, the Federal army was withdrawn therefrom, in order that there might seem to be no menace or control, and Peney Pena was elected in the room of Santa Anna. The Federal troops obeyed the law of Mexico because it was a part of the Mexican guarantee of civil liberty, and because our army, its officers and soldiers, in those days recognized the doctrine which we contend for now, that the menace of armed men at the polls is utterly incompatible with free elections.

We propose to take out the words "to keep the peace at the polls," and the statute will then stand as is the law of Pennsylvania today. Of the necessity for this action, arising from practical experience, I shall not now speak. I content myself with the assertion of the broad principle that free elections with troops at the polls are impossible. The right and the power in the executive arm of either State or Federal Government to place troops at the polls on election day is an utter denial of what is vital to the free exercise of the elective franchise. I care not whether there be but one soldier to 10,000 square miles, or one soldier to every acre in this broad country. Behind the power of one soldier acting under the authority of the executive command of military power at the polls stand 40,000,000 people. It is the obedience of this people to law; it is the recognition that law is mighty, and that the man with his blue coat and his bayonet is a representative of 40,000,000 people that gives potency and majesty to his presence. When you place him there as that representative the effect is as it was in the precinct I have named in our own State in 1860. Then all men bowed their heads in forced obedience, for the Federal power was there to intimidate and control them; they dare not attack it, they must acquiesce; the law unlawfully asserted coerced obedience.

This sentiment of obedience to law actuates all of our people, and it is because law and the power of law brings troops to the polls without necessity and in derogation of one of our great rights that we seek to repeal this statute. In my own experience I have had to send an unarmed sheriff to arrest a crowd of men acting in violation of law. When it was suggested that we should have troops to aid the officer, I said no, a true and brave man acting in the performance of his duty under the command of law is worth 1,000 troops; and it so proved. The feeble assertion that there is no danger of intimidation because there is only one soldier to the 1,000 square miles is simply begging the question. Behind that one soldier stands the power of a great people. At the polls he is under the control of his officer and he may be directed to do what partisan zeal or malignity may find for him to do. Such a possible use of power is the deprivation of that great right that finds its existence in every bill of rights in this country, that belongs to the people, is a part of their ancient liberties, and to be protected and preserved even at the sacrifice of the blood of Anglo-Saxons.

There has been in the past nothing of the kind, and its enforcement now takes away one of the greatest and dearest rights that belong to this people.

We propose to take away this power. We propose to stand by the American system of free elections. That is our doctrine in this bill. We propose to stand by the American system as it exists in the bills of rights of the States and as it was found all over this country until this exercise of war power in 1862, 1863 and 1864. We propose to separate the ballot from the bayonet. We propose to restore to the civil power its absolute control over all the machinery of Government. A free system of laws cannot tolerate even the possible use of force at the fountain-head of power. It is a standing menace, a perpetual threat. In the interest of the people, in the light of the plainest principles of civil liberty, in the performance of a plain duty, in the exercise of the legislative power of this people, we propose to restore to the American people their system of free elections.

The Congress of the United States makes appropriations for but two years. The President of the United States cannot enlist a man or pay a dollar without an appropriation by Congress. Congress makes rules for the government of the land and naval forces, and these short appropriations and this limited authority of the Executive over them are the very basis of our system. We propose, as I have said, in the execution of a plain purpose, following precedents and practice and law and organic law to their legitimate results, to restore by this bill to the American people their own system of free elections. Why should we not do this? Who denies the right to free elections? Has the Senator from Maine denied this right? Will any Senator deny this right? Will any gentleman attempt to argue that the right to free elections does not belong to this people as one of their great cardinal rights? If so, why not restore it? The answer is much narrower than the concealed but real argument. Are the people not entitled to free elections? Why is it that Senators do not rise in their places and assert that the people have not a right to be free from Executive interference? The argument of the Senator from Maine is that you will not be interfered with, no troops will interfere with you; there are only so many troops here and so many there; you are not being interfered with. But the Senator forgets that upon the statute-books of this country there stands a law which gives to the Executive the power, the right to do this thing, and that in partisan bitterness, in the control of elections by one party or the other, a standing menace may become an actual, a terrible fact in the future as it has been in the past.

Are we met with a frank denial of the value of this right or of the right of this people to be freed at the polls from the menace of armed force? I venture to say that no Senator will put his argument upon that ground. None so bold as to assert that in the heated partisan contests that occur in the elections of this country the presence of armed troops, controlled by the one or the other political party, conduces to free elections. Either the substance or the shadow of military power at the polls is destructive of the essential element contemplated by almost every State constitution in this country in its express guarantee of free elections.

Another argument is used. Let us see what it is. First, we are denied the power to mold legislation. That is the first argument. The two houses of Congress, the legislative power, is denied the right to mold legislation in its own way. Second, it is said to be a revolutionary practice and coercive of the Executive; and third, that our intent is (that is the drift of the argument made by the Senator from Maine) to break down the Government. My colleague in the House, the oldest in service there, who trains with the other side, who does not belong to the Democratic party, treated this talk about revolution and coercion very well when he said it was "revolutionary in a Pickwickian sense." There is no revolution nor coercion here. There is an attempt to play upon words and upon passion in order to get a response from the people in antagonism to the assertion of the people's plain right.

The form of this legislation is sustained by precedents without number. The processes that we pursue are the modes of the constitution. We neither seek to coerce the Executive nor submit to be coerced by him. We follow the line of precedent and the modes pointed out by the constitution in every particular; there is no departure. The labored argument of the Senator from Maine that this is the dictate of a Democratic caucus is an entire error. No Democratic caucus ever saw this bill, no agency but that of the Senate and the House and the committees of the Senate and the House ever saw this bill and passed upon it. It is here as a result of the right of the representatives of this people to mold legislation through the recognized constitutional bodies.

It is said that we are trying to coerce the Executive. There is no attempt here at coercion. Where do you find it in this bill? It exists only in the lively imagination of the gentlemen who assert it. Sir, we will not coerce, nor will we submit to coercion, notwithstanding the finely-rounded periods with which the Senator from Maine concluded his remarks a few minutes ago in the effort to produce coercion.

We have our rights under the constitution, and we propose to follow them to their legitimate conclusions. The Executive has his rights, and our performance of our duty will not be by one jot or tittle in the way of his performance of his duty as he thinks right to perform it under his oath and the constitution. In the exercise of a plain duty imposed upon the legislative power, which is vested with the power to raise armies, to make rules for its government, and to enact all laws necessary to carry into execution the powers granted to it, these bodies are about to pass this bill in accordance with law and precedent. There is no provision of the bill violating the constitution, and no pretense will be made that any does. Its disputed clause relates to the employment of the troops whose pay we vote. We have no issue with any other branch of the Government. We seek to make none. In the exercise of the rule of the majority we follow practice, precedent, law, and organic law to their legitimate result, as we judge our duty calls us. We will not be driven into any issue with any other power. Each of these bodies must perform for itself, under the oath that it has taken to support the constitution, its clear and plain duty. When the Senator taunts us with the exercise of the negative of the Executive he undertakes to coerce the representatives of the people and of the States, the bodies vested by the constitution with the legislative power.

The right to place legislation upon money bills belongs to the legislative power. It is nowhere denied in the constitution. The propriety of the exercise of this right is to be judged of by the two houses, and by them alone. No other branch of the Government can object to the bill for this reason. We are the sole and exclusive judges of this question, and when we act our judgment cannot be impugned by either the Executive or the judiciary. The subject-matter of the legislation may be criticised, but the form of its enactment is solely within our the discretion.

Sir, let us look at this subject. Congress has three branches. Each one is independent in its sphere. Each branch of Congress has a negative on the other, and that fact is a vital fact in the preservation of the liberties of this people. The English system of separate branches is our system, and it is vital in it that the Senate shall have an absolute negative upon the proceedings of the House, and the House shall have an absolute negative upon the proceedings of the Senate. But because the Senate refuses to pass a bill that has matter in it that the Senate will not agree to when it comes from the House, refuses to pass a bill because of that matter, is the Senate revolutionary? Does that follow? It is the plainest proposition in the world that this is a constitutional right and invaluable as a check. It cannot be dispensed with as a part of the governmental theory of this country that each house is to have an absolute negative upon the other. And the negative of the Executive is a check upon the legislative branch, limited by the two-thirds provision.

The exercise by either house of its right to refuse to pass a bill because of denied matter in the bill is the exercise of a plain, clear, constitutional right. The exercise of this right by the Senate is by no means revolution. A President has the right to veto a bill. It is by no means revolutionary that he should veto a bill; yet he undertakes by the exercise of his qualified negative to require us to do what he wishes. That is a part of his clear right; it belongs to him under constitutional authority, and I would be the last to attempt to take it away from him. It is vital here as it is in the legislative branch. But when the Executive vetoes a bill and we pass the bill by two-thirds, we are practically coercing the Executive. That is the inevitable conclusion, but this is constitutional coercion. The Executive, in pursuance of his qualified negative given to him by the constitution, returns us the bill with his objections, and two-thirds of the legislative branches pass the bill over his veto. We are exercising the executive power, but are we revolutionary? We are exercising the legislative power of this republic, but it is neither revolutionary nor coercive.

But suppose the bill comes here and we have not the necessary two-thirds to pass it over his veto, what follows? We undertake to pass the bill, we put it upon reconsideration in accordance with the constitution and it fails for want of two-thirds, what then? Are we to be coerced in regard to our legislative right? Are we to say that we must pass the bill in the form he wishes because the Executive has vetoed it? The right of non-action, the right to decline to act under such circumstances, is as much the right of this house and of the other house and of the two houses acting in their legislative capacity as is the right of the President to veto a bill. We might decline to act and go no further; we need not initiate the legislation anew. If we could be compelled to do this, then the independence of each branch and the independence of the legislative power is absolutely gone, and you have no longer a majority vote for the President, and the minority can coerce legislation and the minority become the majority, and, with an unscrupulous Executive cohering the power of the minority with patronage and place, you have your Government revolutionized by the minority usurping and controlling the power of the majority, in which, under our system, it is vested by the constitution and the laws. This is the inevitable result. There is no power anywhere. It belongs to the legislative branch to act or to decline to act. When it does decline to act, it is exercising a plain, clear, constitutional right, and it must act, as must the Executive act, in full view of its responsibilities to the people. That is where the responsibility comes at last. The power to do this is with us, but we must act in the view that it is ultimately to be judged of by the last tribunal in this country, the tribunal of the people, and if we are not standing by doctrines and measures which the people will approve, if we are not maintaining the rights and the liberties and the ancient freedom of this people, they will not sustain us, and they ought not; but if, on the contrary, we decline to act, in obedience to our clear constitutional right, in defense of the rights and liberties and privileges of a free people, they will sustain us, and this Congress will write upon the history of this people an ineffaceable record that their representatives in the Forty-sixth Congress were true to the liberties of the American people.

Sir, each must be responsible for its conclusions and its actions to the people themselves, and each must act in full view of that ultimate tribunal. The power of the legislative branch to raise armies and vote supplies is to be exercised as that legislative branch judges wise. There is no power to control, to direct, or to coerce it. If the Executive differs, his negative controls unless two-thirds overrule it. If not, the bill falls, but his negative does not compel us to act.

Sir, this mode of coercion never was intended to be used upon the legislative branch. There is nothing in the constitution or in the history of this people that can be construed to mean that the legislative branch shall act at the dictation of the Executive; it is not found in our system anywhere, and it cannot be cited to deter us from that which is a plain, clear duty.

Another argument has been made use of in regard to the exercise of the negative of the President, which it seems to me is without foundation: that is, that he has the right to judge at all times and under all circumstances of the character of the legislation that he shall veto. Where this power is used upon a bill that he judges to be unconstitutional, or is hasty, unwise, or improper legislation, then it is very clear that he has this right, and he ought to have it. But when in the history of this Government was he ever called upon to or did any President ever veto a repealing statute? When, where, under what circumstances, in what condition of affairs, did the President of the United States ever veto a bill that repealed a law which clothed him with power and took it from the people? When and where did any President of the United States ever veto a bill to repeal a law that gave him control to send troops to the places of election with the power to coerce the people and take from them their rights? When and where has the President ever vetoed a bill giving the people of this country any of their liberties, or repealing a statute which took from them their rights? There are none such, and the people will never sustain such action.

The Executive negative practically refers the question to the people, and to them we and he must appeal. This power never was intended to be used to keep a yoke on the people or to destroy a repealing statute. Ordinarily the people sustain vetoes. Why? Because of the refusal by the Executive to accept power wrung from the people; but suppose you reverse this and by your repealing statute give to the Executive more power, which power is wrung from the States and the people, then there comes an entirely different question; and I tell Senators that we can face the ultimate tribunal of the people in denying supplies to the Executive power on a bill which gives back to them a great cardinal right. In such a case we will have the old question of Kingly prerogative against popular right; and upon that issue we can go to the people with perfect confidence and safety.

But is it not a strange argument that the legislative power which controls the purse, and, through that, the sword, has no right to say who troops are to be used; that the legislative power is not to have any control over this subject? It seems to me this is a very singular argument. The purse was given to the legislative power to control the sword, and they go together, and the rights and the liberties of this people are to be taken care of by their immediate representatives and the representatives of the States in this Chamber as the legislative power of the country, and when an attempt is made to coerce them from an effort to restore to the people their plain, clear rights, a new issue is made up, and one that we can very well place ourselves upon.

Sir, the veto power never was intended and never has been used to deprive the people of free elections or to strike down any other of the cardinal rights of a free people. When it is used for such a purpose we may with implicit trust await the verdict of a betrayed and outraged people. If it be to such a result in such a cause the American people are invited, the legislative majority in Congress will aid in writing upon the pages of our history a new and startling proof of the proud determination of American freemen to defend and maintain their own system of free elections.

Sir, we were never called to a plainer or more imperative duty, and we should be faithless if we faltered in its performance. The restoration of the liberties of the people, of the landmarks of civil liberty; the removal of the burdens that have come to the people from the changed condition which four years of civil war brought upon them; a restoration to them of the rights that that changed condition deprived them of, is our sole purpose in this bill. We have no other. We should not be true to the people if we had any other. No department of this Government has the right to resist our constitutional demand for the repeal of this menace to free government, which it is, as it stands upon the statute-book to-day. Sir, some writer has said our liberties are traceable through 1,000 years of English and American history. They are the possessions of those who ever advance, not by senseless clinging to the present, but by holding, repairing, improving, grasping the good of the present, remodeling the political fabric when decay is present, and improving at every step of essential progress.

OYSTERS are never eaten in their fresh state in China. After being taken from the shell, they are plunged into boiling water and then exposed in the sun until thoroughly dried. In such condition they retain their delicacy and native flavor for a long time.

SELF-ACTING MACHINERY.

Labor Almost Entirely Dispensed With.

[From the New York Bulletin.]

Some time ago we made mention of a certain machine for making yarn and "diamond cord," said to be in operation in the Bradford district, England, which is entirely automatic in its working, and needing attention only to renew the supply of raw material or lubricate the different parts. Such a statement, although taken from one of the leading English trade-papers, seemed so surprising that it appeared to need confirmation, and we have, therefore, summarized the facts given below from other responsible sources. In what are known as the Oak Mills, near Low Moor, England, there are a number of the machines referred to, running 132 hours per week, requiring attention but once during forty-eight hours, and producing beautiful fabrics, without any flaw in the goods or irregularity in the machine. The most important part of the announcement is, that goods produced by this invention, which before its introduction sold at £2 5s 6d, are now selling at £1 4s. The machines can work as well in the dark as in the light, and were, according to last accounts, employed in manufacturing diamond yarn, capable of being used for a great variety of purposes, such as for piece-goods, scarfs, ladies' shawls, neckties, trimmings, etc. The yarn is produced with a combination of colors, all of which are distinct, and may be made of any kind of material. The single threads used are so fine as to produce 20,000 yards to the ounce; and they can be increased in thickness so as to weigh 100 yards to the ounce. The goods are produced so cheaply that they now find a good and profitable market in Paris, where previously they could not be sold, owing to the high French tariff. With reference to the manufacture of yarns, it is stated that one girl, paid at the rate of 14 shilling per week, can produce £1,000 worth of these yarns in six days. In fact, labor can hardly be said to be an appreciable item in the cost of the goods produced. The width of the trimmings manufactured for ladies' dresses, etc., varies from half an inch to nine inches; while one girl can produce £100 worth of these in a week, against £5 worth, the make of an ordinary weaving-shed for the same time. The proprietor declares that, when he first began the making of this class of goods, he paid about £100 per week in wages; but, with his new machinery, he pays scarcely anything, and now makes four times the variety, at the same time commanding a much larger trade. Some 3,000 or 4,000 combinations are capable of being produced the same day. Silk spools, containing all shades of colors, are pegged and ready for the machines, and are so arranged that they can be instantly changed in the process of manufacture. In one day a girl can prepare warps sufficient to supply the machines for forty-eight hours, during which time they require no attention. If the piece of mechanism really deserves all that is claimed for it, it must revolutionize the branches of manufacture in which it is engaged. The facts are certainly rather astonishing, but they are vouched for by competent authorities, and we give them for what they are worth.

One of Washington's Strong Points.

He is a great man who can occupy the first place in a nation, and at the same time prevent his weakness from being known. The thing most necessary is, not how to be perfect—for that is impossible—but how to seem so. In this Washington succeeded. If he ever did anything wrong he was probably sorry for it, but his first step was to lay the blame on some person who could support it better than he. If he complained that the coffee was muddy, he did it mostly by substitute. If he threw the morning butter in a fit of impatience against the wall, it was done to test the staying qualities of the colors of the wall paper. If he sometimes slipped up on the ice and was momentarily undignified, he laid it to his little hatchet, and the lookers-on forgot to smile. Once he put on another man's hat in a moment of absent-mindedness, and the hat descended to his shoulders. "This," he said, with the utmost sobriety, "is the hat of Martha's first husband. I regret to perceive that he was a swell-head." And thus was he not only relieved from the embarrassment of the moment, but he made a point against the person who was first in the heart of his amiable partner.—Buffalo Express.

The World's Mortality.

The earth is inhabited by about 1,300,000,000 of inhabitants, viz:

Of the Caucasian race	360,000,000
Of the Mongolian	550,000,000
Of the Ethiopian	190,000,000
Of the Malay	200,000,000
Of the American Indian	1,000,000

All these respectively speak 3,064 languages, and possess 1,000 different religions. The number of deaths per annum is 33,333,333, or 91,934 per day, 3,730 per hour, 60 per minute, or 1 per second. This loss is more than compensated for by the number of births. The average duration of life throughout the globe is 33 years. One-fourth of its population dies before the 7th year, and one-half before the 17th. Out of 10,000 persons, only 1 reaches his 100th year, only 1 in 500 his 80th, and only 1 in 100 his 65th. Married people live longer than unmarried ones, and a tall man is likely to live longer than a short one. Until the 15th year, women have a better chance of life than men: but beyond that period the chances are equal.

Figs.

Mr. G. F. Needham, of Washington, thinks that the people of the Northern States make a great mistake in not raising figs. He says that the fruit is grown successfully in England, where the foggy atmosphere is not nearly so favorable to it as our sunny land. Northern climes are even better than Southern, because too great heat is inimical to the plant, and our days are more evenly tempered than those of the South. In Ohio it has been found that the fig tree is quickly grown, is easily protected, is a sure bearer, and is very prolific. The trees begin to bear when two years old, and when they have attained an age of four or five years produce from the same area, with less labor, a greater and more certain crop than either potatoes or tomatoes. Mr. Needham adds that what is true of Ohio is true of the whole North.

The Dress of a Mexican Horse.

The decorations of the horse were even more dashing and infinitely more costly than those of his rider. A small bridle, heavily ornamented with silver, with a very large and powerful bit, by means of which the most stubborn animal can be instantaneously stopped when at full speed; stirrups of solid or plated silver, and an immense saddle with large saddle-flaps of skin, dressed with the hair on, hanging down in front to the horse's knees, while a heavy petticoat-like covering of stiff, elaborately-stamped brown leather, called a Cortex shield, inclosed the whole hind parts well down to the haunches. At this point it terminated in a deep, heavy fringe of iron chain-work, whose jingling noise seems to constitute the chief happiness of the Mexican rider. All these accoutrements—the bridle, saddle, reins, etc.—were richly embroidered and decorated in the gold, silver and colored silks which make the equipment and harness of a Mexican cavaliero so expensive. The leggins, spurs, leathers and coverings of the stirrups are all embroidered; some of the former are so elaborately ornamented as to cost $150 a pair, while the whole dress, if it has any pretense to fashion, cannot be purchased for less than $500. The saddles are particularly expensive, and, in almost any saddler's shop, may be seen half a dozen of of them, ranging in price from $200 to $500, and even as high as $1,000. It is said that the saddlers of no other country can make a Mexican saddle, and it is to be hoped that no decent workman will attempt it. Large and heavy, they are very safe and easy for the rider, but it is a rare thing to see a horse return from a journey without a sore back.—Cor. New York Evening Post.

The Chinese.

A late letter from Hong Kong, China, says: "The passage of the Anti-Chinese bill by the Congress of the United States and its subsequent veto by President Hayes attract great attention among the natives. The vernacular newspapers of Hong Kong and Shanghai, especially the former, are extremely bitter against the proposed measure, claim the protection guaranteed by the treaty, and draw pictures of future relations and the exclusion of Americans from Chinese soil. They exaggerate the consequences to America of the withdrawal of Chinese labor, but speak with moderation and firmness of reactionary movements by China on her own ground."

Cutting Off His Fingers to Escape Work.

In the penitentiary, this morning, R. D. Huntington, a convict from Ashland, cut off three fingers of his left hand to escape work. He thought that the work was too difficult for him. He laid his hand on a block, and with a hatchet in his right began chopping. The first blow took off about half an inch from the last three fingers. Again he struck, hewing off some more of the fingers. Still thinking that he had not taken off enough, he slashed away again. At this juncture the guard saw him.—Columbus (Ohio) letter.

A Big Calf Story.

The other day, in this paper, was published the claim of Mr. J. R. Coe, of Sloan, Iowa, that he had the largest calf, at birth, ever known in this country. The embryo bovine weighed 114 pounds when born, and 124 pounds five days afterward. Now comes Mr. R. A. Sanderson, of Byron, Ill., who says that in the spring of 1859 he knew a calf, one day old, in Steuben county, N. Y., that weighed 126½ pounds, and thinks that his assertion is susceptible of proof. Which makes it very evident that it isn't safe to bet on big calves being the biggest. Now who has a bigger calf-story to tell?—Chicago Journal.

A Pig's Tail Causes Murder.

The length of a pig's tail led to a murder in Madison county, N. C., last Thursday. Two farmers, named Norton and Gaither, disputed concerning the length of the tail of a pig which they were examining. Norton gave Gaither the lie, whereupon Gaither told Norton to get ready for a deadly fight. Both men drew their revolvers almost simultaneously. Gaither was fatally wounded and Norton lost a thumb. The point as to which of the two men was right in regard to the length of the pig's tail remains undecided.—Baltimore Sun.

A Considerate Baker.

On a recent trip of one of the steamers running to San Francisco, bread was served at dinner one day which tasted strongly of coal-oil. The Captain afterwards asked the baker if he did not know that kerosene had got into the flour. He admitted that he did. "Why didn't you feed the flour to the chickens, then?" was asked. "Oh," he replied, "I was afraid it would kill 'em."

Southern Opinion.

Gen. Beauregard has expressed his views on the Presidential question. He declares either Thurman or Bayard would be most acceptable to the South, although Gen. Hancock is the most popular in Louisiana. Among the Republican leaders he considers Conkling the least objectionable to the South.

THE London Standard, having stated that there was no well-authenticated case of a man or woman surviving a century, a correspondent reminds it that Canon Be[illegible], of the English church, is still living; that he was ordained in 1801, and that he must have been 23 years of age then or he could not have been ordained.

THE oldest woman in New Hampshire who accepted the privilege of voting at the recent town elections was Mrs. Lovey Wentworth, aged 90 years, of Bollinsford, who walked to the ballot-box in that town with a firm step and deposited the first vote of her life.

AUBURN, INDIANA, MAY 1, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY, EDITORS.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

The democracy of the town of Auburn, is requested to meet at the old jail building, on next Saturday Evening, May 3, '79.

At 8 o'clock, P. M., for the purpose of nominating five trustees, one clerk, one treasurer and one marshal, to be voted for at the annual corporation election on Monday, May 5th, 1879. Every democrat and citizen who favors economy and good management of town affairs, should be present.

By order of Committee.

Every democrat in town should attend the caucus next Saturday evening, and assist in putting a good ticket in the field.

A very interesting article giving an analysis of congress from the beginning of the government until the present time is reproduced on page six of this paper.

The Cincinnati Enquirer thinks there is some ground, after all, for the charge that the democratic party just now is "revolutionary;" as it is in exact harmony with the declaration of independence—a revolutionary document.

Judge Howland, of the Marion circuit court has rendered a decision in favor of John Lee, one of the new directors of the northern prison. The case will be taken to the supreme court without delay.

The great speech of Senator Wallace of Pennsylvania, as delivered in the United States Senate, on the army appropriation bill, is well worth reading by all liberty loving people. It will be found on the third page of this paper, headed, BAYONETS AT THE POLLS.

Mark Gray, the youth who attempted the assassination of Edwin Booth at Chicago, a few days since, labors under the very-much-mistaken idea that he is the greatest Hamlet of the age. He is evidently jealous of Ed's reputation, and wants to supercede him by getting him into the great Hereafter.

Hayes has vetoed the army bill, and is now a radical saint in the estimation of Chandler, Blaine & Co. He has placed himself upon the record as favoring bayonets at the polls, and against free elections. The message is a lengthy document, full of partisan ear-marks, and is notable only for an absence of convincing argument. The country demands a firm stand by the democrats in congress. The fraud will be repudiated.

Peter F. Stevens, who has been on trial in Chicago for killing his wife, was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to 14 years in the penitentiary. As the prisoner was being taken from the court-room to his cell, Mrs. Young, his mother-in-law, stepped up quietly behind him, put a pistol to his head and pulled the trigger. Fortunately for the prisoner a handkerchief in which the pistol had been concealed interfered between the hammer and cap and caused the pistol to miss fire.

Memorial Day was observed at Augusta, Ga., last Saturday. W. I. Gary, mayor of the city, delivered a national and patriotic address in which he said: "Let us begin our work with that heavenly inspiration which teaches the creed of forgiveness and peace. Let us remember that bravery ceases to be partisan when death stamps us with his seal. Let the sky above typify the mingling of the blue and the gray. Let us remember the graves of the dead heroes of our whole country. Let us forget, as we would that it should be forgiven and forgotten."

Does that sound as though "Union soldiers were despised, and the stars and stripes trailed in the dust," in the south?

It should be remembered that the law whose repeal the president is said to be about to veto was not regarded by any party as having any sanction in the constitution until during and after the late civil war. A statute authorizing "military, naval and civil officers" of the United States "to keep the peace at the polls" by the use of federal "troops or armed men" could not have been enacted by any congress during the first three-quarters of a century of our history, and it is not likely that any president prior to 1860 would have signed such a bill had a congress passed it. "The time is out of joint" when it is the repeal of such a law, and not the law itself, that encounters a veto. A great political party fighting, even to the extent of an unprecedented use of the veto power, to keep the army at the polls! It is idle for republicans to say that they didn't wish to use the army at the polls—that they are not using it in that manner. If they didn't intend to use it in that manner and for that purpose, why should they move earth, if not heaven, to keep the power to use it? —Cincinnati Enquirer.

A King—Rally, Democrats!

(New York Sun.)

Would the democrats of the United States—especially would the distracted democratic party of the state of New York—unite to prevent the overthrow of our republican form of government and the substitution in its place of an hereditary monarchy? Would they unite to oppose a King?

Very likely it will prove to be for nothing less that they are now asked to remove and forget all minor differences, and combine together for the defeat of General Grant.

To be sure, there is no provision in our written constitution prohibiting more than two terms of the presidency to be held by one and the same man. But there is a tradition hardly less binding and sacred.

If the traditions and examples of the fathers are to be disregarded, how long will the provisions of the written constitution be treated as obligatory?

Grant is a military man, a firm believer in military power, and with very little real respect for constitutions or for traditional usages. He longs to be a King. He would be better pleased if the delegations from our legislature and the legislature of Pennsylvania and other bodies which are to welcome him home were to lay at his feet a crown, and ask his acceptance of it.

Grant, if elected a third time, will never leave the White House again voluntarily.

Let the people heed this warning.

Will the democracy unite against Grant—will they unite to oppose a King?

A Big Blaze.

Notre Dame university, the famous educational institute located near South Bend, Ind., together with the infirmary, music hall, old men's home and minim's play hall, were totally destroyed by fire on Wednesday of last week. The origin of the fire is not definitely known but it is supposed to have been caused by the use of hot pitch in making repairs on the roof. Concerning this celebrated institution, the South Bend Tribune says:

"The University at Notre Dame was founded by Very Rev. Father Sorin, Superior General of the congregation of the Holy Cross, and is the most flourishing Catholic educational institution in the United States, the usual attendance of students being from 500 to 700, from all parts of the United States, and many of them being from foreign countries. It is rich in its libraries, zoological, ornithological, etymological, numismatic and other collections, as well as rare gifts from patrons and good-wishers. One of these last is a telescope from the late Napoleon III, presented when he was Emperor of France. The corner stone of the college building was laid on the 28th day of August, 1843. It was completed during the next year, and at that time was a building in the shape of a parallelogram, 80 feet long, 80 feet wide, four stories high, with a plain pitch or gable roof. Ten years later, in 1853, wings were added to this structure, projecting in front, and leaving an immense open gallery in front of the main building. The building then covered a ground space of about 160 feet long by 80 feet wide. In 1865 it was yet found too small, and two more stories were added, the upper one being a mansard and above it half hipped roofs. In the center was an immense dome, the largest one in the State, built on the model of the one at St. Peter's in Rome. On the 31st of May 1880, the colossal statue of the Virgin Mary was blessed and placed on the summit of this dome. This statue was nearly ten feet in length and its contour easily observable from the city. On the occasion of its being placed in position, Archbishop Spaulding and other eminent dignitaries of the church from all over the United States were present, and the gathering was one of the largest ever seen at any educational institution.

OTHER BUILDINGS.

The prosperity of the university called for additional buildings and a large number of them sprung up around the college. Prominent among these are the church of the Sacred Heart, a magnificent structure whose interior is rich with statuary, sculptured columns, and whose walls and ceilings are the highest realization of art in the frescoes and decorative work of Gregori, the famous Italian artist, whose life work, until coming to Notre Dame, was devoted to the art in Rome. This structure is on the west of the university and owing to the wind escaped. In rear of it is the Father General's habitation, a handsome three-story brick with mansard roof. To the rear of the university are the engine and boiler houses, refectory, printing offices of Ave Maria and the Scholastic, etc. On the east and close to the university is the Infirmary; next to it the Old Men's home; a little further to the east, fronts the Music Hall, east of it the Minim's Hall, and still further front Washington Hall. All these buildings are close to the main structure, while still further away are a score or more buildings, some of them of beautiful architecture."

The loss is estimated at $200,000. The university building was insured for $60,000. Of the eighteen piano's in music hall, only one was saved. The library contained about 2500 volumes all lost. Several persons were injured during the fire, but all will recover. The work of rebuilding will commence at once.

Jackson Township.

—Farmers busy sowing oats.

—The rain has made it too wet for plowing for a few days.

—Wheat is looking well in this neighborhood and bids fair for a good crop.

—A. Davis is erecting a new barn, which will be quite an addition to his already well-improved place.

—Joseph Prosser, of Concord, and Miss Louisa Bolts, of Jackson, were recently married at the residence of the bride's father. May peace and prosperity crown their efforts, and all their troubles be little Bolts to their happiness.

—William Stafford moved from this place to Auburn, a short time ago, where he will run a dray.

—Sabbath-school was organized at Grove Bethel last Sunday, with the following officers: O. Zimmerman, superintendent; J. J. Walter, secretary; and Miss Olive Nelson, chorister.

PICKWICK.

Why Will You

Allow a cold to advance in your system and thus encourage more serious maladies, such as Pneumonia, Hemorrhages and Lung troubles when an immediate relief can be so readily attained. Boschee's German Syrup has gained the largest sale in the world for the cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung Diseases. It is Dr. Boschee's famous German prescription, and is prepared with the greatest care, and no fear need be entertained in administering it to the youngest child, as per directions. The sale of this medicine is unprecedented. Since first introduced there has been a constant increasing demand and without a single report of a failure to do its work in any case. Ask your Druggist as to the truth of these remarks. Large size 75 cents. Try it and be convinced. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

Auburn Courier.

Local and Miscellaneous

—First of May.

—Get out your dusters.

—Nice rain Sunday, wasn't it?

—Where did the peanut stand?

—White vests and soda water are in bloom.

—Mrs. H. C. Bell returns to-day from a visit to Michigan.

—The merchants on our side of the square want a pump.

—W. C. McGoutgal, of Newville, was on our streets yesterday.

—Sheriff Leas and lady are spending a few days at Indianapolis.

—The Buckeye clothes-wringer can be bought at Davis' for four dollars.

—Another big rain-storm Tuesday evening—regular April thunder-shower.

—Coop Ralston slings a barrel of salt around with the ease of a grown person.

—Pretty soon, boys by the score; will yell "hardly ever," from "Pinafore."

—Dr. Casebeer and lady, of Auburn, were in Garrett Sunday last.—Garrett Herald.

—Geo. H. Duncan, of Waterloo, was registered at the Swineford house last Monday.

—The net receipts of the Catholic church fair, held at Garrett last week, were $44.90.

—A new lawn-mower attracted some attention in the court-house yard Tuesday morning.

—Mrs. Swineford, of Auburn, was a guest of Mrs. Dills on Tuesday last.—Butler Record.

—Another large assortment of clocks and watches just received at Abright's jewelry store.

—Mill men will take notice that they can buy engine oil at Davis', at manufacturers prices.

—We venture the assertion that yesterday was the finest day of the season—as is to-morrow.

—Bro. Powell, of the Herald was in town on Monday last, and honored the COURIER office with a call.

—Overcoats one day and palm-leaf fans the next. This is a remarkable country in which we reside.

—Hoyt, the druggist is having a big run on the Holman fever and ague pad; we mean he is selling lots of them.

—The cheapest place in DeKalb county to buy hats and caps, or gent's furnishing goods, is at G. H. Yesbera's.

—Davis has the best stock of wagon and carriage makers hardware in the county, and sells at uniform low prices.

—The little blue bird warbleth his little solo in the tree top, and the little boy fireth at him with his little sling-shot.

—C. W. Cook, who whiles the hours away at the junction and takes his rations at Hollister's, Sundayed over at Tiffin, Ohio.

—If that young attorney doesn't let up on those nocturnal sittings, Mr. Stemets will be liable to close in on him with a rent bill.

—Who ever heard of hats being so cheap, until Yesbera added them to his line of goods? Old prices have vanished like the mist.

—You can find the best brands of white lead rubber and other mixed paints at Davis' a little cheaper than any other place.

—That dam(p) shower of Sunday was delightful for the crops, but we didn't enjoy it;—were out in it with a perforated roof.

—Wall-paper, and window-shades, and wall-paper, and window-blinds, and wall-paper, and —w-a-l-l-p-a-p-e-r, at Hoyt's drug-store.

—Murphy & Baldwin are now engaged in kalsomining the restaurant of Mr. Sherman Hollister. Step in and take a look at the work, when completed.

—"In the midst of life we are in debt," says an exchange. Aye, too true! Debt borders upon our birth, and our cradle stands within the poor-house.

—Dr. Ed. Morris, of Fort Wayne, was in the city yesterday, endeavoring to collect some riches. He did so, and donated a portion of it to the COURIER office.

—An exchange happily remarks: "Enjoy yourself when you can." We would like to form the acquaintance of any man who can enjoy himself when he can't.

—Our popular dentist, Mr. R. Elson, goes to Wayne county, Ohio, on next Saturday, to attend the golden wedding of his parents. He will be absent all of next week.

—This "hardly ever" business is getting rather stale; it was a pretty good thing, but, like all things, it has faded—got monotonous—wasted its sweetness. Give us a rest.

—We called to see Bro. Powell of the Garrett Herald, one day last week, and found him busy, as editors usually are, in preparing the weekly feast for the reading public.

—H. Sturtevant, who has been acting in the capacity of assistant clerk at the junction, returned to his home in Jackson yesterday, where he takes a position in the general offices.

—If any of our subscribers prefer to do whitewashing, or make garden, in place of paying their subscription in money, they can have an opportunity by calling at this office soon.

—We learn with regret of the serious illness of Mrs. D. Burniston, of north Main street, who was attacked with pneumonia on Saturday last. She is said to be in a critical condition.

—A small farm-dog, doubled and twisted as though he had cramp colic, or a case of serious final come-and-get-us, was an object of commiseration on Seventh street, Tuesday evening.

—Superintendent Rummel, at the poor-farm, has seed potatoes for sale, of the early rose and peerless varieties. Those wanting pure seed will do well to procure it before the supply is exhausted.

—Abright has the most handsome and convenient bed-room alarm clocks we have ever seen. They are real beauties and just as convenient as they are beautiful. Every family ought to have one.

—That new story, "The man who tramps," by Lee Harris, may take well in some localities, but people in this region do not care for it; the man who tramps is pretty generally known around here.

—Wanted, at the COURIER office, a printer who can have a man's job ready for him ten minutes before the copy is furnished, and who can insert everybody's advertisement at the top of the column.

—A fashion writer says: "It is the style in France for ladies to take their tea in bonnet and gloves." Some American ladies take their "tea" in a glass, with a little piece of lemon and some sugar in it.

A full line of summer underwear for gents, and a large assortment of shirts, collars, ties, half hose, handkerchiefs &c. &c., just opened at the furnishing store of G. H. Yesbera. New goods and new prices.

—Neil McKay, railroad contractor, of Fort Wayne, was in town Friday and called at the COURIER office. He left us some Leadville papers, to which place he is talking of making a trip in the near future.

—There are yet two or three good store buildings vacant around the square. Rents are not high, either, and there is a first-class opportunity for several energetic business men to accumulate riches therein.

—This is exactly the right time to have your seedy-looking wood-work painted and your dingy walls kalsomined; and Murphy and Baldwin want it understood that they take a back seat to nobody on that kind of work.

—Abright, the jeweler, is now opening and placing in his cases a large lot of silver plated castors for table use which will be offered at prices within the reach of all. They are a great convenience, and every family should have one.

There is a reaper whose name is Ryan,
And with his mowing machine
He mows the grass in the court-house yard,
And the shade-trees that grow between.

But if Billy's action in this matter were compulsory, he'd think he had a hard row to mow.

—In another column we give the report of the town treasurer, and a statement of the trustees, showing that the town is in good shape financially. The affairs of the town for the past year have been managed economically, as the people will see by the reports.

—An antiquated Teutonic gentleman, bearing a striking resemblance to Rip Van Winkle, anchored at the Central on Tuesday night. He had a pipe like a coal-bucket, with a stem like a fish-pole, and when he fired it up—whew! didn't you smell it?

—F. L. Clark, F. P. Copper, W. W. Hoffman and H. Sturtevant—a "stag party"—went up to Waterloo Tuesday night, where they attended—a dance? no—a very quiet little euchre party. There were girls there, of course, and everybody had a fine time.

—If anybody finds a stray stallion knocking around loose, catch him and send him down to the Saginaw depot; he belongs to the railroad company. Frank Copper says he went off last Monday, "without saying nobody to anything," and has remained off ever since.

—Messrs. Picker & Bumpus, whose card will be found in another column, have contracted for the erection of brick buildings for the following parties in Auburn, viz—Dr. Allen—residence; Tom Somers—saloon building; and Schaab, Beugnot & Co.—addition to business house.

—Fort Wayne saloon keepers pasture goats in their vestibule doors, in the vain hope that it will attract the attention of the thirsty traveler and induce him to invest his odd nickels in "bock" beer. But he doesn't do it; he merely fastens a clothes-pin to his nose and glides along to the next saloon.

—G. P. Smith, formerly chief-clerk at the junction for the Saginaw and Eel River roads, returned last Friday and resumed his old "posish" on Monday, having spent about three months "seeing the elephant" in Mexico and Louisiana. He reports an h. o. t., and looks as though he had dined seven times a day.

—Everybody is invited to attend the German dance at the Chicago house in Garrett, on tomorrow (Friday) evening. Good music has been engaged for the occasion, and the managers are making arrangements to provide for the comforts of all who attend. Those who love round dances should not fail to be on hand.

—Mrs. W. W. Humes was taken to the insane asylum Monday morning. Her violent spells are only occasional, and she can be readily pacified at such times by proper treatment. She was almost entirely rational when taken away, and it is believed and sincerely hoped that a speedy cure will be effected at the asylum.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. Sent for one stamp. Address MURRAY HILL PUB. CO., No. 129 E. 28th St., N. Y. 11-6m.

—Some of the 'bus-men at Ft. Wayne tried to put up a job on Conductor Geo. Mogford, of the Ft. W., J. & S., last Monday. They inveigled him into a 'bus, just as his train was about to move out, and started off with him at a lively gait; he managed to squeeze out of the door, however, barely escaping a watery grave in a mud-puddle. The train left five minutes behind time.

—A freight car loaded with salt was opened at the junction, Friday, by the car repairer, as it had become damaged some on the journey, and it was found to contain a brace of ripe tramps, who mildly inquired 'where in h—l are we?' They had been in there three days, with only a salt diet, and looked hungry enough to eat a corpse and chase the coffin.

—While spending a few hours in Garrett on last Friday, we were permitted to go through the extensive shops of the B. & O. railroad, and had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Hopkins, the general foreman, and Mr. Clarkson, the foreman in the blacksmith-shop, both gentlemen of intelligence, and well fitted to fill their respective positions with credit to themselves, and to their employers.

—Some marauder is tampering with our wood-pile—borrowing it in sections, when we're not here—and we would mildly suggest that he ought to let up. We are not running very heavy fires now, to be sure, but we expect to in the fall and may need the wood. We can stand it about one night more, however, before calling on Pete (our heavy man) to punch the pilferer.

—One of our young attorneys was in a peck of trouble a few days ago. He ordered a bill of shirts (two whole ones) from a city factory, and they didn't come at the appointed time, which necessitated his retracting the order in an elaborate letter. He stated that the delay had greatly annoyed him, and he had been compelled to favor another house with his order. Too bad; somebody might have donated one for the occasion.

—A young fellow in a farmer's wagon tried hard to furnish us with a sensational article, Tuesday afternoon, as we sat pondering over the effects of too much mince pie for dinner. The young man's team were about to ignore his presence in the wagon, and were hustling him along towards the Ohio state line at the rate of something less than three miles a minute, having become scared at the unfastening of the neck-yoke, but were stopped without accomplishing any serious damage.

—On Saturday May 10th, the citizens of DeKalb and adjoining counties will have an opportunity to invest in live-stock, machinery and agricultural implements at the residence of Wm. Brand, two miles west of Waterloo. Among the important items mentioned in the sale-bill, we find an Aultman & Taylor separator and steam engine, a Birdsell clover-huller, a Massilon separator and horse-power, horses, cows, young cattle, sheep, bees, corn and an endless variety of farming tools and agricultural implements. The sale will commence at 10 o'clock. Terms very liberal.

—The Warsaw Indianian jumps onto us for seeming inconsistency in publishing what our newspaperial brethren had to say concerning the recent change in the COURIER, while in the same issue we poked fun at the Indianian for its self-written eulogies. We failed to note any lack of consistency in this, since our puffing was kindly furnished by disinterested parties, and not by ourselves. Perhaps the Indianian cannot make the distinction, but to a man with green goggles everything looks green.

—Since our last report the following parties have obtained the state's consent to travel in double harness and bask in the sunshine of each other's smiles through this vale of tears:

Jacob Grime, and Margaret Beck, Samuel J. Kiser and Jennie E. Johnson, Lewis N. Houlton and Rhoda C. Martin, Oliver Stofer and Alice Freed, Philly Morell and Mary Morell, Jonas H. Hart and Annie Cahill, Hurdel Sewell and Mary Clark, Francis M. Kirkpatrick and Loella Ober, Joseph C. Prosser and Louisa Baltz, Nicklaus A. Dammann and Sophie Steffen.

Old Settlers' Meeting.

THE SEVERAL SUB-COMMITTEES, TO-WIT:

On speakers and programme, R. Culbertson, J. E. Rose and Guy Plum.

On site for meeting, T. D. Gross, Wm. Carr, and D. K. Houghton.

On music, Mrs. Dr. Swarts, M. F. Long, Miss Cyddie Hare, Jos. W. McKay and John Treesh are requested to meet at 2 o'clock p. m., Saturday, May 3d inst., at the Central House, for consultation, and to make further arrangements for the annual meeting to be held June 19th next.

W. H. DILLS, Sec'y.

—Mrs. A. J. Little has just returned from the east with a large stock of millinery goods of the best quality and latest styles, selected with the greatest care, personally, and having remained some time in the largest trimming establishments in the east, she is prepared to give the very best satisfaction in latest styles, quality and prices, of everything in the millinery line. Call and see her, old place of business, north of the Auburn House.

—The Valparaiso Messenger strutted in last week with its head high in the air and tail over the dash-board, looking as proud as a 16-year-old hired girl with a pair of bran new red shoes; and well it may, for Indiana can produce but few papers that can compare with it in neatness and general "make-up." It starts out on its ninth year with a new head and two columns larger around the waist, which is abundant evidence that it is flourishing like a green-bay tree. "Zim" is determined to give the Porter county people their money's worth, and the COURIER hopes they may ever appreciate it and fill the Messenger's sanctum with two-dollar bills, and its editors heart with gladness.

—The fire department at Ft. Wayne concocted a good scheme to entrap two boys who were suspected of turning in false alarms from the street boxes, which has been a great annoyance of late. Last week it was announced through the papers that John Downey, a hose-cart driver, had been discharged for neglect of duty. Downey soon afterwards got the two youths, whose names are Kiser and Delzell, to get into a buggy with him for the ostensible purpose of taking a drive; but, instead, he got them "full," when they immediately propsed to turn in an alarm and "get out the boys." This they did, by means of some apparatus they had contrived for that purpose, when Downey took them down to police headquarters and handed them over. This will doubtless do away with false alarms, as these smart alecks will be made an example of; they can be fined not to exceed $100—and ought to be.

—Rev. Young will hold services at the Catholic church next Sabbath, at 10 o'clock a. m, assisted by Rev. Collins. This will be the last opportunity to hear Father Young for several months, as he leaves on Monday next for an extended tour through Europe, and Africa. He will go by way of Waterloo to New York, in company with Mrs. Jacob Kahn of Waterloo, and a Mr. Kahn of Edgerton, Ohio. At New York, the party will take passage on the steamer Gellart of the Hamburg line, on the 8th inst, thence to Havre, where he will leave the other parties and proceed to Paris, thence to Marseilles, thence to Algiers, Africa, where he will visit his father and brother, from thence he will go to Rome, Italy, thence to Vienna, thence to Switzerland, thence to Strausburg to visit another brother, thence to Belgium, thence to London, thence to Ireland, returning to America about the last of August. Father Young came to this place about seven years ago and organized the first Catholic congregation, has since erected a church building and greatly increased the membership. He now takes his first leave of absence, with the well wishes of his people for a pleasant journey and safe return. Rev. Collins will have charge of the congregation during the absence of Rev. Young.

—Mr. Geo. Hazzard, of Auburn bank robbery fame, spent Sunday in this city. Mr. H. seems to have taken quite a notion to Logansport, having had quite a lively time on the occasion of his visit here some months ago.—Logansport Journal.

If George wants to have "a lively time" we advise him to come up and spend Sunday in Auburn.

Delightful Bouquets.

Dr. Price's Concealed Delight, Pet Rose, Hyacinth, Alista Bouquet, Ladies Favorite, and his other handkerchief perfumes are truly delightful bouquets. They are certainly the most exquisite scents that can be imagined—the odors of dainty buds and rich blossoms.

He is Coming.

G. S. McCord will canvass the county this spring and summer with his patent feather renovator on wheels. This machine has won a reputation in Auburn, and vicinity, that recommends it to the public. This process of steaming and cleaning feathers only needs a trial; it recommends itself, will remove all filth and increase the size of a bed from one-third to one-half and give the feathers the life and appearance of new ones; no damage to the feathers whatever. Price still lower than ever. Don't be humbugged; don't let your beds go from your house; if we don't suit you, we don't take your money.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A ATILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. MISS EDITH'S MODEST REQUEST.

My papa knows you, and he says you're a man who makes reading for books;
But I never read nothing you wrote, nor did papa—
  I know by his looks.
So I guess you're like me when I talk, and I talk,
  and talk all the day,
And they only say: "Do stop that, child!" or
  "Nurse! take Miss Edith away."

Papa said if I was good I could ask you—alone
  by myself—
If you wouldn't write me a book like this little one up on the shelf;
I don't mean the pictures, of course, for to make them you've got to be smart;
But the reading that runs all around them you know,—just the cutest part.

You needn't mind what it's about, for no one will see it but me
And Jane—that's my nurse—and John—he's the coachman—just only us three.
You're to write of a bad little girl, that was wicked and bold and all that;
And then you are to write, if you please, something good—very good—of a cat!

This cat she was virtuous and meek, and kind to her parents, and mild,
And careful and neat in her ways, though her mistress
  was such a bad child;
And hours she would sit and would gaze when her mistress—that's me—was so bad,
And blink, just as if she would say: "Oh, Edith,
  you make my heart so sad."

And yet, you would scarcely believe it, that beautiful angelic cat
Was blamed by the servants for stealing whatever,
  they said, she'd got at.
And when John drank my milk—don't you tell me!
  I know just the way it was done—
They said 'twas the cat—and she sitting and washing her face in the sun!

And then there was Dick, my canary. When I left its cage open, one day,
They all made believe that she ate it, though I know that the bird flew away.
And why? Just because she was playing with a feather she found on the floor,
As if cats couldn't play with a feather without people thinking 'twas more.

Why, once we were romping together, when I knocked down a vase from the shelf,
That cat was as grieved and distressed as if she had done it herself;
And she walked away sadly and hid herself, and never came out till tea—
So they say, for they sent me to bed, and she never came even to me.

No matter whatever happened, it was laid at the door of that cat.
Why, once when I tore my apron—she was wrapped in it, and I called "Rat!"—
Why, they blamed that on her. I shall never—no, not to my dying day—
Forget the pained look that she gave me when they slapped me and took me away.

Of course, you know just what comes next when a child is as lovely as that;
She wasted quite slowly away—it was goodness was killing the cat.
I know it was nothing she ate, for her taste was exceedingly nice;
But they said she stole Bobby's ice cream, and caught a bad cold from the ice.

And you'll promise to make me a book like that little one up on the shelf,
And you'll call her "Naomi," because it's a name
  that she just gave herself;
For she'd scratch at my door in the morning, and,
  whenever I'd call out: "Who's there?"
She would answer, "Naomi! Naomi!" like a Christian,
  I vow and declare.

And you'll put me and her in a book. And, mind,
  you're to say I was bad;
And I might have been badder than that but for the example I had;
And you'll say that she was a Maltese, and what's that you ask? "Is she dead?"
Why, please, sir, there ain't no cat! You're to make one up out of your head!

OLD BOSCAWAN'S WARD.

It was a stormy night, on a bleak New England coast. The wind and rain kept driving pitilessly, and the white, hungry waves came thundering over the sand-hills and breaking in cataracts of foam upon the desolate, rocky shore. In a room of a little cottage built so close to the sea that some of the breakers, more aggressive than the rest, seemed almost to threaten to overwhelm it, old Roger Boscawan sat smoking his pipe beside the fire, that roared up the wide, old-fashioned chimney, as if in defiance of the tempest of wind and rain outside.

"Bless me! Leah, do you hear the storm?"

"Yes, father."

It was a strangely beautiful face that looked up into the weather-beaten one of the old man from the shadow of the projecting angle of the fire-place, and strangely out of place it seemed among the rough surroundings of the fisherman's cabin. Large and lustrous were the eyes of Oriental, midnight darkness, white-lidded and long-lashed. The forehead low but broad, around which the luxuriant hair was braided in heavy classic coils; the cheeks of a dusky carmine, and the mouth sweet and expressive, and perfect in its curves and the dimples that it showed when it parted in a smile. Many people had often wondered how old Roger came to have a daughter equally unlike himself and her brother.

"I pity any craft that is out to-night," the old man went on. "I have lived on this coast for more than fifty years, man and boy, and never saw a wilder night than this."

Leah did not answer. She had risen from her seat, and, crossing the room, was looking out of the window, seaward. She could see nothing through the pane except the driving storm and the red, lurid lamp of the lighthouse, but in the other direction could be discerned a few twinkling lights of the fishing village, and further toward the town, among its dark clumps of evergreen, the windows of Hallam Lodge ablaze with light. Hallam Lodge was the oldest and grandest house for miles around, and was owned by the man whose name it bore, the direct descendant of Ralph Hallam, Colonel in the Parliamentary armies, who had crossed the ocean for his principles, and laid the first stone of this new dwelling-place more than 200 years ago.

Suddenly the tramp of approaching feet was heard through the storm outside, and the next moment the door opened to admit Stephen, old Roger's son, and three other men, who carried the insensible body of a man between them. He was a fine, handsome fellow, this son of the old fisherman, but utterly unlike his sister both in feature and in complexion, having a clear, ruddy skin, though somewhat browned with exposure to the weather; honest blue eyes, and curling, chestnut hair. He might have sat to an artist for a picture of some old Norse Viking's son, but a tender look came into his face and his voice assumed a softer tone as he spoke to the girl.

"It is the young gentleman that they say is going to marry Miss Edith Hallam," he said as they laid the unconscious man on the warm hearthstone before the fire. "His yacht struck on the rocks below the lighthouse, and all hands were lost but him. He has a breath of life in him yet, though, and we may pull him through. Give me some of that rum out of the closet, little sister."

She did so in silence, and then, in obedience to her brother's command, knelt down and chafed the wet, white hands of the unconscious man, while Stephen poured some of the spirits down his throat.

She could not help admiring the handsome face, so still and pallid, supported on her brother's knee. The features were regular and highbred, with dank, black curls falling over the high, white forehead. She was thinking, too, what handsome hands they were into which she was trying to rub returning life—almost as small, and how much better than her own—when a sharp knock came to the door, and a young lady, tall but stately, swept into the cabin, and knelt beside the unconscious man.

"I am his cousin, and it is my right," she said quietly yet decisively, as she took the hands, to which the warmth of life was slowly beginning to return, between her own.

Leah relinquished them at once, and shrank back to her position in the shadow of the fire-place with a feeling in her breast she had never known before. This tall, stately young lady was Miss Edith Hallam, the heiress of the lodge, and she was only Leah Boscawan, a fisherman's daughter. She could not analyze the cause that made her mind dwell so bitterly upon the fact, yet it did in spite of herself, and the knowledge of the great social gulf fixed between them filled her with a great vague regret.

In less than half an hour the young man was sufficiently revived to thank his preservers and accompany his cousin in her carriage, which waited outside, to the Lodge. He thanked them all most cordially. To the three men who had assisted him he gave money, and to Stephen his card, which showed his name to be Frank Vernon, and promised to call the next day and thank them again. Both the old man and his son were taken with his manner, and spoke in praise of him and his supposed betrothed; but Leah, sitting silent in the shadow, said nothing, brooding in silence over her newly-awakened thoughts, with vague, rebellious feelings against her destiny surging in her heart.

The storm did not abate that night nor the next day. Neither did the next day bring Frank Vernon to the cottage, but he sent a message saying he was too unwell to leave the house. When night again fell the wind was still driving the heavy rain along the shore, and the fury of the sea seemed unabated. The old man and his daughter sat in their old positions beside the fire and listened to the storm without.

"Leah," the old man said, breaking the silence, "where is Stephen to-night?"

She had been busy with her own thoughts, intently gazing into the glowing coals, and she raised her face, aglow with the firelight, to his. Then, with a cry of alarm, she sprung from her seat and caught his head, which was falling forward on his bosom, in her arms.

"Father! speak to me! What is the matter?" she cried, gazing with a great dread at the set and rigid features and lips, from which all color had fled, leaving them white as ashes.

"Leah," the old man gasped, "I am dying. Quick—old Mr. Hallam at the Lodge. I must see him. Tell him I sent for him, and he will come."

The gray head fell back upon the chair as he spoke. The girl, nearly frantic, and knowing not what to do, kissed him in a wild, frenzied way, and then dashed out into the night and storm.

It was a long way, more than a mile, but she did not mind fatigue. She did not feel it any more than she felt the stormy sweep of rain that drenched her to the skin. Her mind had room only for one thought—that she might be too late.

She reached the house at last, and delivered the message to Mr. Hallam in person, and then her overstrained faculties gave way, and she sank in a swoon on the floor.

When she came to her senses again she was lying in a white-curtained bed in a room finer than she had ever seen before, and bending over her was the stately young lady who had come to her father's cottage the night before.

"Has he gone?" she asked.

"Yes," the lady answered; "he is with him now."

She would have risen at once and returned through the storm through which she had come, but the lady was kindly resolute and firm, and forced her to lie quiet and wait.

An hour passed—it seemed an eternity to Leah—when the door opened and Mr. Hallam entered, still dripping with the rain. He crossed the room to the couch and took her hand in his.

"My poor child," he said, "you cannot go home to-night—this is your home from this time forth."

She looked at him in dumb amazement.

"You are my daughter now," he said, "and you must learn to look on me as you would your father."

"And he?" she cried out, flinging up her arms with an unconscious gesture of entreaty.

"You must bear it calmly, poor child," he answered her. "He is dead."

How it chanced that she should become the adopted daughter of the rich Mr. Hallam was much of a mystery to Leah, even when months had passed, and, the sorrow for her father beginning to wear off, she became more accustomed to her new position. Mr. Hallam was kindness personified; but from the rest of the household her quick instincts held her aloof. They were all kind to her, but an indefinable something felt, though not expressed, that she was not to the "manor born" and a sort of interloper, raised a barrier between them. As for the visitors, of whom there were many, of course this had nothing to do; but still the feeling was in her mind the same, and she became cold and reserved.

As for Frank Vernon, he became fascinated by her—so much so that it became a subject of remark. At last he proposed, and she accepted him.

She did not love him, but she liked his society, and she loved no one else, and felt proud of his talents and handsome person, as any girl would have done. She made a condition, however, that their engagement should be kept a secret until her brother Stephen, who had gone on a voyage of several months, should return.

A week afterward Stephen came. She was almost beside herself with delight at seeing him. It would have been a revelation to any one who only knew her as the stately, Juno-like beauty of the Lodge, to see her hang about his neck and kiss him again and again through her joyful tears.

At length she told him how Frank Vernon had asked her to be his wife, and she had accepted him. The change that came over him startled her. His face grew pale as death to the very lips, and a wild mist swept over his eyes—only for a moment, however, and then he brushed the back of his hand across his eyes and forced a smile.

"Leah," he said, in a voice that trembled in spite of his efforts to keep it calm, "if it is for your happiness I will try to bear it. I have had dreams, when I kept my lonely watches, that some time you might love me well enough to be something nearer to me than a brother. I see what a fool I have been now—you a lady and an heiress, while I am but a poor fisherman—but let it pass; the memory of my little sister will always be the dearest thing I can have on earth."

She stood thunderstruck for a moment, almost deeming him mad.

"What do you mean?" she managed to gasp at length.

"Do you not know? Have they not told you," he cried, "that you are not my father's daughter, not my sister, but the only child of Mr. Hallam's brother, and the lawful mistress of Hallam Lodge?"

The color faded from her face, leaving it so pallid he thought she was going to faint. Then as quickly the warm blood rushed back again, suffusing her face to the very roots of her hair.

"Are you sure of this?" she asked.

"As sure as of my own life," he answered. "I heard it when Mr. Hallam did, from father's dying lips, and saw the documents to prove his words. I know I should not have spoken to you as I did; but forget it all, Leah—"

"It is so sudden," she interrupted him, "but I do not wish to forget them. They have lost me my brother, it is true, but they have also found me something nearer, though dearer he could never be. Stephen, look into my eyes and tell me were your dreams so very wild after all?"

Of course Mr. Hallam was very much disappointed, and Frank Vernon even more so. The one, however, found consolation in being allowed to retain Hallam Lodge, and the other by returning to his old love and marrying Edith. Leah and her husband are happy in each other's love—what more need be said?

CONGRESS.

An Analysis of That Body from the Beginning of the Government—Interesting Statistics—Cases of Accidental Death, Homicide, Assassination and Suicide.

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.]

THE POLITICAL REGISTER AND CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY: A Statistical Record of the Federal Officials, Legislative, Executive and Judicial, of the United States of America, 1876-'78. Compiled by Ben: Perley Poore, Clerk of Printing Records, United States Senate.

To the general public the main interest of this work is in the legislative part, which contains statistical sketches of the delegates to the Continental Congress, and of all—each and every one—of the Senators, Representatives and Delegates who have been elected to the forty-five successive Congresses under the Federal constitution.

NATIVITIES.

A careful examination of the book has been made for the purpose of embodying and classifying the main facts relating to the subjects of these sketches. The total number of sketches. The Total number of sketches is 5,337, many of the subjects being men whose service in Congress was of the briefest duration. Others, men who were not admitted, though claiming election or legal appointment, and others, men who were rightfully elected or appointed, but died before taking their seats. Of those whose nativities are recorded, all but 142 were born in the United States, New York leading off with 704, Pennsylvania following with 598; Virginia, 532; Massachusetts, 439; Connecticut, 340; and the rest, in sporting language, "distanced." Ireland has furnished most of our foreign-born statesmen, as well in Congress as out, England, Scotland and Germany following with about equal representation. The following table shows the nativities of members of both houses more minutely:

States.	No.	States.	No.
Alabama	29	Mississippi	13
Arkansas	6	New Jersey	203
California	1	North Carolina	225
Connecticut	340	New York	704

EDUCATION.

The education received by the subjects of the memoirs is indicated in the following table, though it should be added that in the great majority of those marked as having received a classical education the statement is added that it was acquired through their own efforts, by teaching school or engaging in some occupation, which enabled them to go through college. Those marked self-educated seem to have received no outside assistance and were mostly negroes:

Academic	875
Classical, or Collegiate, or Liberal	1,798
English	183
Private	21
Public School	1,155
Sabbath School	8
Self-educated	20
Military education	96

LONG TERMS OF SERVICE.

The practice of sending men to Congress for term after term prevails, as is well known, much more generally in the East than in the West, and among the older than in the young communities. Of the Representatives, only a very small proportion have had the honor to serve more than two terms.

OCCUPATIONS.

The following table shows the occupations followed by members of both houses. In many cases they have followed several occupations, beginning, perhaps, with a trade, in a store, or on a farm, and winding up in the law, which they followed for a livelihood. In every case, as far as possible, the occupation is given in which they engaged at the time of their election:

Architects	1	Merchants	290
Actors	1	Miners	6
Apothecaries	1	Ministers	45
Bankers	79	Millwrights	1
Barbers	1	Millers	1

Mechanics	19	Wheelwrights	1

HEREDITY.

From the colonial days to the present it has frequently happened that several generations of the same family have served in either or both houses. A collection of the most prominent—notably the Adamses, Bayards, Breckinridges, Harrisons, Chandlers, Stocktons, Frelinghuysens, Heisters, etc.—presents a strong confirmation of the theory of hereditary genius.

SANGUINARY DUELS.

It is surprising to note the number of members who have died in affairs of honor, as they used to be called.

The case of Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury under Washington, the head of the Federalist party, and perhaps the leading spirit in the formation of the constitution, mortally wounded by Aaron Burr, at Hoboken, July 3, 1804, is, of course, the most prominent, and will so readily occur to the minds of all that no farther mention need be made of it.

The first American statesman to perish by means of the duello, however, was Richard Dobbs Spaight, of North Carolina. He had served in the Continental army and the Continental Congress; had sat in the convention which framed the constitution; been Governor of North Carolina, and served in the Fifth and Sixth Congresses. He was succeeded in Congress by John Stanly, who challenged him in a quarrel growing out of the contest. The parties met on Sunday afternoon, and, on the exchange of the fourth fire, Gov. Spaight received a wound from which he died in less than twenty-five hours. Sept. 6, 1802, Stanly was tried and sentenced to imprisonment, but was pardoned by Gov. Williams, of North Carolina, within less than a year. As indicative of the public sentiment at that time regarding such affairs, it may be stated that Stanly was subsequently elected for one term to Congress, and for nine terms to the North Carolina House of Commons, dying in 1826 from a stroke of paralysis.

The next victim to the code, succeeding Alexander Hamilton, was Thomas K. Harris, a Representative from Tennessee in the Thirteenth Congress, who died from wounds received in a rencounter with Col. Simpson, April 18, 1816.

Spencer Pettis is an addition to the list. The Directory briefly notes the facts of his life as follows: "Born in Virginia in 1802; received an academic education; was admitted to the bar and commenced practice at Fayette, Mo.; was elected a Representative from Missouri in the Twenty-first Congress, serving from Dec. 1, 1829, to March 3, 1831; was killed in a duel which he fought with Maj. Thomas Biddle, at St. Louis, Aug. 26, 1831." The quarrel which led to the renconter was occasioned by Spencer's throwing, what was in Biddle's opinion, an unwarrantable slur upon the United States Bank, the President of which at that time was Nicholas Biddle, the challenger's brother. The duel took place on Bloody island, and resulted in the death of both combatants, Biddle lingering for several weeks before death ensued.

Armistead T. Mason, United States Senator from Virginia from 1816-'17, challenged his brother-in-law, John M. McCarty, to a duel. They fought near Washington city with muskets, Mason receiving a ball through his breast on the first fire, from which he died Feb. 6, 1819.

Joseph Pearson, Representative from North Carolina in the Eleventh, Twelfth and Thirteenth Congresses, fought a duel while in Congress with John G. Jackson, after a political quarrel, was severely wounded, and died at Salisbury, N. C., Oct. 27, 1834.

Another notable affair was that between William J. Graves, of Kentucky, and Jonathan Cilley, of Maine. Graves was a Representative in the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Congresses, Cilley in the Twenty-fifth. They fought near Washington with revolvers, at 80 yards' distance, Feb. 28, 1838. At the third fire Cilley was killed. Graves was subsequently elected to the Twenty-sixth Congress, perhaps, in the language of politics, to give him a vindication at the hands of his constituents.

The last member of Congress whose death is recorded as resulting from a duel is George A. Waggaman. Waggaman was a practicing lawyer in New Orleans, largely interested in sugar-planting, Secretary of State of Louisiana under three successive Governors, and was elected United States Senator in place of Edward Livingston, resigned, serving from Jan. 3, 1832, to March 3, 1835. The rencontre in which Waggaman lost his life occurred near New Orleans March 23, 1843.

SUICIDE.

Suicide has been by no means infrequent among members of Congress. The self-murder of Haywood Yancy Riddle, who shot himself through the head at Lebanon, Tenn., a short time since, dying almost immediately from the effects of the wound, is still fresh in the mind of the public. Riddle was elected a Representative from Tennessee in the Forty-fourth Congress as a Democrat, Dec. 14, 1875, filling the vacancy caused by the death of S. M. Fite. A fatality unprecedented in the history of the Government had attended the Congressmen elected to the Forty-fourth Congress from this district. John W. Head was elected on the first Tuesday in November, 1874, and died in a few days afterward. Samuel M. Fite, was elected Dec. 31, 1874, and died Oct. 23, 1875. Neither lived to take his seat. Riddle was also elected to the Forty-fifth Congress. His final act was undoubtedly due to insanity.

Riddle's suicide is simply the last of a list which begins with the foundation of the Government. His is similar, in some respects, to that of James Blair, a Representative from South Carolina, in the Twenty-first, Twenty-second, and Twenty-third Congresses. During the first session of the Twenty-third Congress Blair attended the Washington Theater one night, and, becoming displeased with the actors, fired a loaded pistol at them, for which he was arrested, and fined $5. Physicians testified that he was under the influence of brandy and opium, taken to alleviate pain from chronic rheumatism. Three weeks afterward, April 1, 1834, he blew out his brains with a pistol at his boarding-house on Capitol hill.

Similar, in many points of the case, was that of Felix G. McConnell, a Representative from Alabama, in the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Congresses, who committed suicide in a fit of delirium, in the St. Charles Hotel, Washington, by stabbing himself in the abdomen and then cutting his throat, Sept. 10, 1846.

Another Representative from South Carolina, besides Blair, who committed suicide, was James D. Ashemore, who, after serving several terms in the State Senate, and subsequently was Comptroller General, was elected to the Thirty-sixth Congress from the Greenville district, serving until Dec. 21, 1869. The State having seceded at the breaking out of the war, he entered the Confederate army, and committed suicide by blowing out his brains at Sardis, Miss., Dec. 6, 1861.

Elijah Hise, a Representative in the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses, committed suicide at Russellville, Ky., May 8, 1876. Hise was the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor of Kentucky in 1836, but was defeated; was Charge d'Affaires at Guatemala from March 31, 1848, to June 31, 1849; was Presidential elector on the Buchanan and Breckinridge ticket in 1857, and served in Congress from Dec. 3, 1866, to March 3, 1869.

John White is to be added to the list. He was born in 1805; received an academic education; studied law; was admitted to the bar, and practiced at Richmond, Ky.; was elected a Representative from Kentucky in the Twenty-fourth Congress, as a Whig, without opposition, and was successively re-elected to the Twenty-fifth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-seventh and Twenty-eighth Congresses without opposition, serving from Dec. 7, 1835, to March 3, 1845; was Speaker of the House during the Twenty-seventh Congress; was Judge of the Nineteenth Judicial Circuit of Kentucky; committed suicide at Richmond, Ky., Sept. 22, 1845.

James G. Wilson, United States Senator from New Jersey, from Dec. 4, 1815, to 1821, was severely injured in December, 1832, by imagining, in a fit of delirium, that his house was on fire, and throwing himself from a second-story window. He had been editor of the True American; Clerk for many years of the State House of Representatives; was appointed by President Monroe Postmaster at Trenton, and at the time of his fit of delirium was a member of the State House.

William Ramsay, of Pennsylvania, is another Congressman who died by his own hand. Born in 1810, he was attached to the American Legation at London under Minister Stevenson; was elected a Representative from Pennsylvania in the Twenty-sixth Congress as a Van Buren Democrat, serving from Dec. 2, 1839, to Oct. 17, 1840, and re-elected to the Twenty-seventh Congress. A few weeks afterwards he committed suicide at Barnum's Hotel, Baltimore, by shooting himself in the right eye.

John Ewing, of Indiana, was found dead in his room at Vincennes, Ind., in December, 1857. He had been a Representative in the Twenty-third and Twenty-fifth Congresses, serving until 1839, and had previously served in the State Senate. On his table was found the following epitaph, apparently just written by himself:

Here lies a man who loved his friends,
His God, his country, and Vincennes.

A mournful and tragic suicide was that of Alfred P. White, of Ohio. White had been a Representative in the Twenty-eighth Congress, and State Treasurer, appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the removal of Treasurer Gibbs for fraud. In 1862 he was appointed, by Secretary Chase, Collector of Internal Revenue for the Columbus district, was subsequently detected in contraband cotton speculations, was found to be a defaulter, and committed suicide by taking poison on the grave of his two children, in Columbus, Ohio, Aug. 1, 1865.

James Henry Lane, twice United States Senator from Kansas, serving up to 1866, committed suicide by shooting himself near Fort Leavenworth at the end of his term of office.

James S. Johnson, Representative from Kentucky in the Thirty-first Congress, committed suicide while suffering under mental depression caused by ill-health, at Owensboro, Ky., Feb. 12, 1873.

ACCIDENTAL DEATHS.

Of the deaths of Congressmen which may be termed accidents, the most prominent, perhaps, now in the public memory is that of Clement L. Vallandigham, which resulted from a wound received by the accidental discharge of a pistol while he was arguing a murder case at Lebanon, Ohio, June 17, 1870.

Robert Hanna, United States Senator from Indiana in 1831-'32, was killed by a railroad train while walking on a track at Indianapolis, Nov. 19, 1858.

Still another case was that of Abraham B. Venable, United States Senator from Virginia in 1803-'4, and Representative in the Twenty-third, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-fifth Congresses, who perished with seventy others, in the conflagration of the Richmond Theatre, Dec. 21, 1811.

James Hamilton, Representative from South Carolina in the Seventeenth, Eighteenth and Nineteenth Congresses, Governor of South Carolina, and subsequently United States Senator from Texas, was drowned going from New Orleans to Galveston, the steamer Opelousas, on which he was, having been run into by the steamer Galveston, Nov. 15, 1857. Hamilton was a literary man, and was one of the founders of the Southern Quarterly Review.

Josiah Stoddard Johnson, thrice Senator and once Representative from Louisiana, died May 19, 1833, from the effect of an explosion of gunpowder on the steam packet Lioness on the Red river.

Charles Tillinghast James, United States Senator from Delaware, invented a rifled cannon, and lost his life while experimenting with one at Sag Harbor, Oct. 17, 1862.

HOMICIDES.

There were a few homicides perpetrated by members of Congress, the most notable one being the Sickles-Key affair, Feb. 28, 1859, at Washington, in which Gen. Sickles killed Phillip Barton Key for having criminal connection with his wife. Richard Hanson Weightman, of Maryland, cut a cadet comrade at West Point, for which he was expelled, and afterward killed a Santa Fe trader with the same knife, while a Territorial Delegate from New Mexico in the Thirty-second Congress.

ASSASSINATED.

A number have died violent deaths at the hands of assassins. John Huyler, of Hackensack, N. J., Representative in the Thirty-fifth Congress, died in consequence of an unprovoked assault which was made upon him by a drunken man in the streets of that city, January, 1870. Joseph White, Representative from Indiana in the Twenty-seventh Congress, removed to New York; while on a business visit to Indiana was shot by a drunken man, and died from the effects of the wound January, 1861.

Solomon Sharp, member of the State House of Kentucky, State Attorney General, Representative in the Fourteenth Congress, was assassinated while a member of the State House in November, 1835, and the murderer escaped, although the Legislature offered a reward of $3,000 for his arrest. Mr. Sharp was killed by Mr. Beauchamp for slanders in regard to a woman with whom Beauchamp was enamored. The trial, which resulted in Beauchamp's acquittal, is one of the most remarkable in the annals of criminal jurisprudence, and formed the text for one of the most striking points in a well-remembered lecture by Gov. Charles P. Johnson on "Character in Murder."

Robert Potter, Representative from North Carolina in the Twenty-first Congress; moved by jealousy he committed a brutal assault on two male relatives of his wife, Aug. 28, 1831, for which he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and payment of $1,000 fine; then removed to Texas, where he was killed in a disreputable private quarrel.

ASSAULTS,

more or less deadly, have occurred from time to time among members of either house. The assault on Charles Sumner by Brooks, of South Carolina, has become historical, and, from political causes, is probably more prominent in the public mind than any other, but it is by no means solitary. William Stanberry, Representative from Ohio in the Twentieth, Twenty-first, and Twenty-second Congresses, addressed a communication to Mr. Speaker Stevenson, April 14, 1832, stating that he was waylaid on the night previous, attacked and knocked down by a bludgeon, and severely bruised and wounded by Samuel Houston, late of Tennessee, for words spoken in debate. Gen. Houston was brought before the bar of the House and reprimanded. Thomas D. Arnold, again a Representative from Tennessee in the Twenty-second Congress, was assaulted in the Capitol, May 14, 1832, by Morgan A. Heard, who fired a loaded horse-pistol at him, the ball grazing his arm, and then struck him with a bludgeon.

Politicians.

I never loved the exercise of power, never cared particularly for public places, but I always liked politics, and, what is more, I like politicians. They are a much-abused class. It is the fashion to sneer at them, but I think they are better men as a rule than merchants and bankers and other representatives of what is called respectability. They make more sacrifices and do more unselfish work for others than business men ever think of doing. They cultivate a certain chivalric sense of honor. Even some who are naturally corrupt will refuse the most tempting bribes when the integrity of their party is involved. I have seen enough of political life to satisfy me that its influence is elevating and not degrading. I would much rather be tried by a jury of my political opponents who were acknowledged politicians, than by a jury of respectable business men who said that they took no particular interest in politics, but usually voted the Republican ticket. From them I should expect gross injustice and prejudice ten times as intense as my avowed political opponents would display. The man who serves a cause, if it is not a positively bad cause, is ennobled by the service. He learns to look at men, as well as doctrines, from a higher standpoint than mere personal selfishness. Hence I repeat that I like politicians as well as politics, but I do not like office.—Ex-Gov. Seymour.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

Domestic Greeting.

As homeward comes the married man,
He's met by wife at door;
With fond embrace and loving kiss
And—"Baby's throat is sore!

"And did you think to stop at Brown's
And get that [illegible] about
I ordered yesterday?—and, dear,
Fred's boots are all worn out!

"I'm glad that you are so early, John,
So much I miss you, dear—
I've had a letter from mamma;
She's coming to live here.

"The roof has leaked and spoiled the rugs
Upon the upper hall;
And Bridget must go, the careless thing!
She let the mirror fall.

"What makes you look so grave, my love?
Take off your things and wipe
Your feet—and only think, to-day
Jane broke your meerschaum pipe.

"Oh, John! that horrid, horrid word!
You do not love me, dear;
I wish that I—boo-hoo—were dead—
You're cross as any bear."

Present-Making.

The habit of making presents is so strongly rooted in human nature that if its growth is repressed in one direction it instantly seeks room for expansion in another. The custom of making wedding presents has probably reached its highest level, as there are indications on all sides that it is now, as a general practice, slightly on the decline, this change being seemingly due to a revulsion of feeling in consequence of past excesses. Present giving at tin, wooden and silver weddings has been frowned down by the good sense of society, for invitations to festivities of this kind were always traps of the most aggravating sort, set for the purpose of catching the generous. People will give presents, only there must be something in the occasion a trifle out of the regular order of things to produce spontaneous action. If the dead could only be benefited by our gifts, the floral offerings at funerals show how prompt the response would be; but as this is impossible, attention has been turned to what some persons consider the next most important event in life—birth. For weeks before this event, the expectant mother is loaded down by the gifts of her friends. There are sent to her baby caps, socks, blankets and nursery wares in quantities sufficient to supply an ordinary foundling asylum. With these, as with wedding presents, the trouble arises that the recipient is supplied with an immense number of things which she does not need or desire, and yet by accepting them she is placed under obligations to requite their donors should there be a reversal in the situation. The custom, in its expansive phase, is a relatively new one, but it is one which promises to soon need the correcting force of a well regulated public opinion.

What Weddings Offer.

Weddings offer women an eligible opportunity of getting up a good family quarrel. All the ladies of their connection are in a flutter of excitement, and are far from being mistresses of themselves. In the inevitable confusion of large hospitalities, some distant aunt or some cousin is certain, like the cross fairy who was not asked to the christening, "to take offense." The aimless excitement and flutter now find something fresh to work upon, and settle down into good steady animosities. "Marriage, and death, and division," says the poet rather cynically, "make barren our lives." Marriages generally beget division, or rather, in the general excitement, some slow old grudge is brought to a head and bursts. When the happy pair return after the honeymoon, they are lucky if they do not find that they have to take a side in a feud, and range themselves under the banner of Aunt Jane or of Aunt Matilda. All this is the result of the curious inexplicable passion with which people who do not care a pin for a man or woman throw themselves into their matrimonial affairs. One's birth does not disturb society; one may be christened and confirmed and the world is calm. Our great achievements, if we ever perform any, interest every one more than our kinsfolk. We may even commit crimes, and find that scanty notice is taken of the offense, relations confining themselves to saying that "they always looked for as much." We die, and our intimates are unmoved. Why, then, can we not marry in peace? Why do people seem to become a new and strange sort of beings, of interest to all men, as soon as they are engaged to be married? There must be some mysterious reason for these things, and philosophers may seek it in the remote history of the race. There, however, they probably will not find it, as weddings in the remote history of the race were an unregarded episode, in which the lady was hit on the head and dragged quietly out of the camp. Nor will the philosopher be more happy if he "looks within his own bosom, and listens for the whispers of consciousness." His consciousness has nothing to say on the subject. If he be a married philosopher, he knows that he forgets all about it when he is told that his friends are about to enter into the state of matrimony. He knows that he looks on that as entirely their own affair, and neither history nor experience can inform why his fellow-creatures put themselves into such a flutter. Mankind has always been so constituted that many things which are natural remain inexplicable to the philosopher. We do not think that even Mr. Herbert Spencer has tried to solve the problem connected with the popular interest in weddings.—The Saturday Review.

Good Manners.

'Tis a rule of manners to avoid exaggeration. A lady loses as soon as she admires too easily and too much. In man or woman, the face and the person lose power when they are on the strain to express admiration. A man makes his inferiors his superiors by heat. Why need you, who are not a gossip, talk as a gossip, and tell eagerly what the neighbors or the journals say? State your opinion without apology. The attitude is the main point. Assure your companion that some good news or some bad, you remain in good heart and good mind, which is the best news you can possibly communicate. Self-control is the rule. You have in you there a noisy, sensual savage, which you are to keep down and turn all his strength to beauty. What a seneschal and detective is laughter! It seems to require several generations of education to train a squeaking or a shouting habit out of man. Sometimes, when in almost all expressions the Choctaw and the slave have been worked out of him a coarse nature still betrays itself in his contemptible squeals of joy. The great gain is not to shine, not to conquer your companion—then you learn nothing but conceit—but to find a companion who knows what you do not; to tilt with him and be overthrown, horse and foot, with utter destruction of all your logic and learning. There is a defeat that is useful. Then you can see the real and the counterfeit, and you will never accept the counterfeit again. You will adopt the art of war that has defeated you. You will ride to battle horsed on the very logic which you found irresistible. You will accept the fertile truth, instead of the solemn, customary lie. When people come to see us, we foolishly prattle, least we inhospitable. But things said for conversation are chalk eggs. Don't say things. What you are stands over you the while, and thunders so that I can't hear what you say to the contrary. A lady of my acquaintance said, "I don't care so much for what they say as I do for what makes them say it." The law of the table is beauty—a respect to the common sort of all the guests. Everything is unseasonable which is private to two or three or any other portion of the company. Tact never violates for a moment this law; never intrudes the orders of the house, the vices of the absent, or a tariff of expenses, or professional privacies; as we say, we never "talk shop" before company. Lovers abstain from caresses, and haters from insults, whilst they sit in one parlor with common friends. Would we codify the laws that should reign in households, and whose daily transgression annoys and mortifies us, and degrades our household life, we must learn to adorn every day with sacrifices. Good manners are made up of petty sacrifices.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

"Shall Women Pray?"

This is the text for a telling article from W. P. Black, Esq. Although admitting that there are limits to a woman's sphere of religious activity (Scripturally considered), yet he adduces many beautiful illustrations of the vast influence and worth of woman in Christian work. He says: "We recall the prophecy in Joel, and its fulfillment at the Pentecost, when, after the wonderful apostolic prayer-meeting came the baptism of God. The apostles are named, and then is added: 'These all continued in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, and his brethren.' Have we any doubts from the words of this description, that 'the women and Mary, the mother of Jesus' (who kept 'in her heart' the words of Jesus and the prophecies of Elizabeth and Zacharias, not then as yet written, and perhaps not then even yet known to the apostles, who afterward wrote the Gospels), took part in that prayer-meeting, both in testimony and in prayer and in supplication? Evidently the women spake as well as the men; and this is apparent, not only from the language of the narrative, but also from the particularity of Peter's quotation: 'And it shall come to pass in the last days,' saith God, 'I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my spirit, and they shall prophesy. Manifestly the daughters—the handmaidens—were filled with the spirit, and were prophesying that day, as before they had been praying with the believing ones. Now the word here here translated prophesy means to announce, interpret, or expound the responses of an oracle—to announce the name of a divinity, to predict or prophesy. Are we not justified in concluding that the prophesying of Pentecost was the announcing, interpreting, expounding the glorious message of the gospel Luke xxiv., 47), was exhortation and preaching? Nor did this stop with Pentecost. Phillip had four daughters; and the Holy Ghost saw fit to preserve of them this record (Acts xxi., 8, 9): 'We entered into the house of Phillip, the evangelist, which was one of the seven, and abode with him. And the same man did have four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy,' that is, interpret and expound Cod's message of grace in Jesus Christ. And the Holy Ghost has also thought well to preserve for us this other record (Acts xviii., 26.) Appollos 'began to speak boldly in the synagogue, whom, when Aquila and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly.' A woman expounding the way of God, and to Appollos, one mighty in scriptures! What shall we do with this teacher? And she had learned to teach from Paul, and was tenderly remembered, and greeted by Paul as 'my helper in Christ,' helping even Paul." * * *

"Let us remember that there is one spirit; that in Jesus Christ there is neither male nor female; that in Him we are alike; and that the woman now, as in the beginning, is, in the kingpom of Him, called 'the restorer,' the 'help meet for man.' And where God, in our day, is so plainly calling pure, spiritual women, of large brain, practical judgment, and cultured mind, into the various fields of Christian activity, to lay upon His altar their gift of love, faith, pathos, and zeal, and is also setting the seal of His approval upon their work by the harvest of souls given to their ministry in the Sunday school and mission field, in the pulpit and on the rostrum, through the press and in books of most blessed spiritual instruction and power, let us not say, 'May, I suffer not a woman to teach,' but let us give them a welcome in the name of Jesus, and for the sake of His cause, and say simply 'It is the will of the Lord, and blessed be His name.'"

Fashion Notes.

NEW bonnets are large and flaring in front.

NEW cambrics are in quaint designs, and look like the popular Indian silks.

THE new shapes for hats and bonnets are out in all the new straws.

NEW parasols have sixteen ribs instead of eight. They are very handsome.

THE new Mirecourt lace will be much used for trimming hats and bonnets this summer.

DAMASSE bunting is a new material designed to take place of grenadine; it is stronger, and equally as cool for summer.

STRAIGHT neckties of white mull trimmed up on the ends with Breton or valenciennes lace, and tied in a bow in front, are just now the most fashionable.

THE "summer" silks, so called, have uniform dark grounds, covered with round waists, especially for young girls. Usually they are cut with yokes, but some of the old-fashioned "French" waists are to be seen, and are usually accompanied by two skirts and a belt.

THERE is nothing prettier than "camels' hair" for a serviceable spring suit. But if you trim with silk be careful of the quality of silk, for a thin fabric so soon wears away from woolen. Do not put black with gray, but gray with gray, tone upon tone, color upon color. Black may be used with white, but not with a color.

THE soft Chinese and India twilled silks have suddenly come to the front, and are used for indoor dresses and the evening wear of young girls. The soft ivory-silks wear very well draped prettily, and, brightened with ribbons, make very pretty and not very expensive toilettes, and will doubtless find a large demand among outfits prepared for watering places, as they are really cool-looking and tinted white is now more fashionable than ever.

BLOUSE aprons of brown Holland, trimmed with bands of colored cambric, are as pretty as anything for every-day summer wear, requiring only a skirt with the cotton waist beneath, for very hot weather. The "Sacque" dress is a capital design for seersucker, cambrics or linen, and may be used for pique or cheviot. The simpler the dress the better for a child, and these designs have the merit of being entirely practical and easily made by the most inexperienced seamstress.

ITDIAN mull, gazeline, which is a very fine kind of bunting, white barege, and white delaine, are all suitable materials for white mourning dresses. They should be self trimmed and garnitured with black ribbons. The interior ruffles should be of plain crepe-lisse, finely plaited or crimped. No lace with the exception of Breton, which is not in the least showy, and especially adapted to the trimming of India mull ties and neck wear.

A WELL-FITTING satin corset is now considered the sine qua non of accessories to an elegant toilet, and the color must match the dress. No corset cover is worn over it, but the shape perfectly molding the figure, the dress is fitted upon it and next to it with admirable results. Two satin corsets—one black and the other white—are the most essential, as so many ladies confine themselves to black and white for full dress. The top may be edged with narrow embroidery, or with a simple row of feathered stiching.

A NEW manner of adjustment of embroidered bands enables the wearer to make one dress do double service. The dress may be navy blue silk. A set of embroidered bands in "cardinal" and white is adjusted by a series of extremely small hooks, which are set in the inner edge. These correspond to very small loops, which are set on the dress just below a cord. You may renew your bands by substituting a set embroidered in brown and yellow. Thus your navy blue does for two suits, with a trifling difference in other little accessories at neck and wrist.

How His Pants Were Abbreviated.

A joke is told on a certain gentleman, which is too good to be lost. Our friend, who shall be nameless, purchased a pair of pants a few days ago, which, on being tried on at home, he found to be too long. That night he remarked to his wife that he wished her to take about an inch from each leg, which would make them the desired length. Being fond, as a good many wives are, of teasing her husband, she told him "flat footed" that she shouldn't do anything of the kind, and he retired finally, without having obtained a promise from her that she would attend to the matter. Soon after he had left for his room, however, she, as a matter of course, slipped off the superfluous inch as she had been asked to do. The family is composed of six female members, including the "good man," and it chanced that each one of the five, who were in adjoining rooms, including the mother of our friend, heard the dispute between man and wife about the pants, and after the latter had taken off the required inch and retired, the old lady, desiring to "keep peace in the family," and not knowing what her daughter-in-law had done, cautiously slipped into the room and cut off another inch. In this way did each of the five ladies, unknown to the others, and all with the praiseworthy object of preventing any misunderstanding between the married couple, clip an inch from the leg of the gentleman's trousers. The following morning, all unconscious of what had taken place during the night, he rolled up his pants in a piece of paper and took them to the tailor to be shortened to the desired length. Upon a hasty glance, the latter ventured the opinion that they were already rather short; but the owner was too well posted on that score and insisted that they were fully an inch too long. The tailor had no more to say, and our friend retired. On the following Saturday he called for the pants and took them home, and the next morning when he came to put himself inside of them, he was supremely disgusted at finding that the legs reached only a trifle below the knees. In other words, they had been altered to the fashion of a century ago, when knee-breeches were in vogue. He straightway accused the tailor of having ruined his pants, and his indignation was expressed in language anything but mild. His wife heard him and came to the rescue of the knight of the shears, explaining that she had taken an inch from each of the legs, and her acknowledgment was followed by that of each of the other five ladies, when it was discovered that altogether the legs had actually been shortened to the extent of seven inches.—Allentown Chronicle.

CARDINAL MCCLOSKEY sold his New York residence for $60,000.

Old Times.

A half century ago, a large part of the people of the United States lived in houses unpainted, unplastered, and utterly devoid of adornment. A well-fed fire in the yawning chasm of a huge chimney gave partial warmth to a single room, and it was a common remark that the inmates were roasting one side while freezing the other; in contrast, a majority of the people of the older states now live in houses that are clapboarded, painted, blinded, and comfortably warm. Then, the household furniture consisted of a few plain chairs, a plain table, a bedstead made by the village carpenter. Carpets there were none. To-day, few are the homes, in city or country, that do not contain a carpet of some sort, while the average laborer by the week's work may earn enough to enable him to repose at night upon a spring bed.

Fifty years ago, the kitchen "dressers" were set forth in a shining row of pewter plates. The farmer ate with a buck-handled knife and an iron or pewter spoon, but the advancing civilization has sent the plates and spoons to the melting pot, while the knives and forks have given place to nickel or silver plated cutlery.

In those days the utensils for cooking were a dinner-pot, tea-kettle, skillet, Dutch oven and frying-pan; to-day there is no end of kitchen furniture.

The people of 1830 sat in the evening in the glowing light of a pitch-knot fire, and read their weekly newspapers by the flickering light of a "tallow dip;" now, in city and village, their apartments are bright by the flame of the gas jet or the softer radiance of kerosene. Then, if the fire went out upon the hearth, it was rekindled by a coal from a neighboring hearth, or by flint, steel, and tinder. Those who indulged in pipes and cigars could only light them by some hearthstone; to-day we light fires and pipes by the dormant fire-works in the match safe, at a cost of one hundredth of a cent.

In those days we guessed the hour of noon, or ascertained it by the creeping of the sunlight up to the "noon mark" drawn upon the floor; only the well-to-do could afford a clock. To-day who does not carry a watch? and as for clocks, you may purchase them at wholesale, by the cart load at sixty-two cents apiece.

Fifty years ago how many dwellings were adorned with pictures? How many are there now that do not display a print, engraving, chromo, or lithograph? How many pianos or parlor organs were there then? Reed organs were not invented till 1840, and now they are in every village.

Some who may read this article will remember that in 1830 the Bible, the almanac, and the few text-books used in school were almost the only volumes of the household. The dictionary was a volume four inches square and an inch and a half in thickness. In some of the country villages a few public-spirited men had gathered libraries containing from three to five hundred volumes; in contrast, the public libraries of the present, containing more than ten thousand volumes, have an aggregate of 10,650,000 volumes, not including the Sunday school and private libraries of the country. It is estimated that altogether the number of volumes accessible to the public is not less than 20,000,000! Of Webster's and Worcester's dictionaries, it may be said that enough have been published to supply one to every one hundred inhabitants of the United States.—C. C. Coffin in Atlantic.

Bees on the Wing.

When a swarm leaves for the woods they are off before you fairly know it. They drift away from the hive in a wide-spread and apparently aimless concourse, they suddenly gather up their skirts, draw together thier forces, and away they go, a humming, flying vortex of bees, the queen apparently in the center and the mass revolving about her as a pivot, over orchards and meadows, across creeks and swamps, or woods and deep valleys, straight for the appointed tree, slow at first so that you can keep up with them, but presently with a speed that would tire a fox-hound. In this flight the individual bees do not move in their right lines, or straight forward like a flock of birds, but round and round like chaff in a whirlwind; unitedly they form a whirling, revolving, nebulous mass fifteen or twenty feet across, that goes as straight as a projectile to its mark. They are not partial as to the kind of tree,—pine, hemlock, elm, birch, maple, hickory,—any tree with a good cavity high up or low down. A swarm of mine ran away from the new patent hive I gave them, and took up their quarters in the hollow trunk of an old apple-tree across an adjoining field. The entrance was a mouse-hole near the ground. Another swarm in the neighborhood deserted their keeper and went into the cornice of an out-house that stood amid evergreens in the rear of a large mansion. But there is no accounting for the taste of bees, as Samson found when he discovered the swarm in the carcass (or more probably the skeleton) of the lion he had slain.—John Burroughs, in Scribner for May.

Borrowing Trouble.

If we want something we have got to dig, plant and sow for it. If we want clothing we must raise wool. The great Creator made everything, and pronounced it very good. If we will for a moment reflect, we will see millions and billions of blessings more than we can imagine, not only for our comfort and pleasure. When we come to look into human nature, we will find all this toil and sweat is exactly what we need. I remember about a year ago I was riding on the New Haven railroad. My friend Mark Twain was on board, and he accidentally touched on this subject of borrowing trouble. "Now," says he, "I got a good pious old aunt, who is always borrowing trouble. She is always doing good, but always feels sorry. One day I went into the house and she was sitting in her chair sighing. "Are you sick? I said, 'Oh, no,' said she, 'Heaven cannot be a nice place after all.' On that occasion she absolutely jumped the grave." A few years ago I was visiting a family on Fifth avenue. The husband was a real jovial fellow. We went out sleighing one day in Central Park, and were almost frozen to death before we got back. But the next morning was a lovely one. As each one entered the dining room he would say, "What a delightful day this is. We can go to the Central Park without being frozen." The host says, "Wait until my wife comes down and see what she has to say about the weather I never knew her to be satisfied with any day in her life." Down comes the hostess. We say, "Delightful morning, this." "Do you call this delightful? Why, this is a real weather breeder. We shall have an awful stormy day."

Cetywayo in His War-Gear.

An "Old Colonist" contributes to an English paper the following discription of the King of the Zulus: "His eyes were exceptionally large and brilliant, but his forehead, though broad for a Kafir, was very receding, while the lower part of his face denoted a determined and brutal nature. He was very elaborately dressed. Over his shoulders was fastened a leopard skin kaross or cloak, reaching down to the back of his knees; round his loins he wore a handsome moochy—that is, a band of tiger-cat skins, with a deep fringe of strips of the same skin hanging downward. His wrists and ankles were decorated with rings of red, white and black beads and his hair with several ostrich feathers. In the slit in his right ear (the distinguishing mark of the Zulus, who are all cut in the lobe of both ears in infancy) he carried a very ornamental snuff-box, made from a piece of bamboo cane, carved and decorated with beads, and in the slit in his left ear he carried a comb. The Zulu comb is about six inches long, and is made of bone or ivory. The top of the handle is of the shape of a bowl of a spoon, and with it they measure out snuff. The lower part is elaborately carved. The teeth of which there are only three, are fully four inches long, and resemble the prongs of a fork. In his right hand Cetywayo carried a hunting assegai, and on his left arm his shield. The hunting shield is much smaller than the war shield, and is made in this way: A bullock's skin is dried, and out of the center a piece is cut of the required size and shape, only one shield being obtained from the skin. The center is supported by slips of tough green hide and from top to bottom on the inside a stout stick is fixed, by which the shield is held; and mostly, as was the case with Cetywayo's the top of the stick is surmounted by the tail of the tiger cat."

A Grand Scheme.

General Fremont, now governor of Arizona, proposes to advocate personally before the proper authorities in Washington his plan for bringing the waters of the gulf of California back to what is supposed to be their old basin in southern California. This basin, which is now a dry and sandy desert, is 200 miles long, 50 miles wide and in its central part is 350 feet below the level of the sea. It lies between southern California and Arizona, and is unfit for the sustenance of man or beast. Between the upper end of the gulf of California and the basin or valley in question a ridge of land interposes. Through this it is proposed by General Fremont's plan to cut a canal for a distance of 10 miles to a lake about 20 miles long, and at the other end of the lake continue the canal some 15 miles more. The cost might be $1,000,000 and the time necessary for the work perhaps six months, but the general contends that the benefits to the two states of California and Arizona would be incalculable. The great wants of Arizona are water and moisture. On the eastern slope of the low range of mountains that separate this basin from Arizona all is dry and barren as in the basin itself. The heat is intolerable and no vegetation is possible. The introduction of this great body of water would change the whole face of things. In short, it would make the whole surrounding country to blossom like the rose. In the opinion of the governor the canal should be made deep and wide enough to admit such vessels and steamers as sail the Pacific.

An Ancient Roseberry.

The Bedfordshire (Eng.) Mercury reports a convrsation between one of its representatives and a "centenarian peddler," named John Roseberry, now over 110 years old. The story is singularly interesting, and its salient points are that Roseberry was born in Whitby in 1769, and married, when he was only 20 years of age, a girl seven years his junior, and the daughter of the Vicar of Steeple Claydon. The children of the marriage, twenty-two in number—seventeen boys and five girls—are all dead, and are buried in Peterborough churchyard. Roseberry stated that there are three locks of his hair in the British Museum, and five years ago the Queen cut a look of his hair off with her own hand, at the same time decorating him with a collar which gives him "the mastership of every magistrate in five counties—Northamptonshire, Lincolnshire, Cambridgeshire, Norfolk and Huntingdonshire."

Friendly Counsel.

1. Resist the temptation of circulating ill reports; spread them not at all.
2. If you cannot speak well of another at least do not speak ill of him.
3. Never speak ill of another, behind his back. Why should you consider his character of less value than your own?
4. Speak of others as you would were they present; speak as a friend of him who cannot speak for himself.
5. Consider yourself the guardian of the character of those who may be absent, as you would wish others to guard your character in your absence.
6. Whenever it may be needful to mention anything to the disadvantage of another, let it be done with truthfulness, tenderness, humanity and with the recollection of how much has been forgiven thee.

THE Rev. A. B. Kendig, pastor of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church in Worcester, Mass., made a prayer before his farewell sermon last week in which, after having prayed for every member in the church, the choir, organist, sexton and ushers, he finally prayed for the "one who, although hidden from sight, yet contributes so much to the musical part of our worship," ending, "O, Lord, I mean the boy who blows the organ."

MY COLOR.

BY MARICA D. BRADBURY.

It glistens in the ocean wave,
It lives in yonder summer sky,
The harebell and forget-me-not
Are tinted with its brightest dye.

It sparkles in the sapphire's depths,
Its touch is on the turquoise laid;
And in the robin's speckled egg
Its faintest tinges are displayed.

So far, perhaps, you have not guessed,
But ah! I fear you may surmise
When I confess this heavenly hue
Shines fairest in the baby's eyes.

Give Him a Lift.

Give him a lift! don't kneel in prayer,
Nor moralize with his despair;
The man is down, and his great need
Is ready help, not prayer and creed.

'Tis time when the wounds are washed and healed—
That the inward motive be revealed;
But now, whatever the spirit be,
Mere words are but mockery.

One grain of aid just now is more
To him than tomes of saintly lore;
Pray if you must, in your heart,
But give him a lift; give him a start.

The world is full of good advice,
Of prayer, and praise, and preaching nice—
But the generous souls who aid mankind
Are scarce as gold and hard to find.

Give like a Christian - speak in deeds;
A noble life's the best of creeds;
And he shall wear a royal crown
Who gives them a lift when they are down!

1880.

Hendricks or Tilden.

[Fort Wayne Sentinel.]

To blindly approve its blunders, or slavishly follow its dictation, is not always the best service a democrat can render to his party. I therefore feel free to say further what I think is for the good of the party in regard to Tilden and the campaign of 1880.

Gov. Seymour, in the late interview reported in the New-York Sun, quoted with approval a saying of William L. Marcy, viz.:

"The most difficult duty that a politician has to perform, is to retire gracefully from the stage of public life, when he is too old to be of any further use."

In this quotation Gov. Seymour justifies his own resistance to the importunity of his friends to become again a candidate for governor of New York. He did more than that; he, unintentionally perhaps, read a lesson to Mr. Tilden by which he would do well to profit.

The republican party, in so far as my observation goes, is the only zealous advocate of Mr. Tilden's nomination, unless I except Mr. Tilden's personal followers, and especially his ally in the Louisville Courier-Journal, whose new-born zeal for Tilden, and opposition to Hendricks, find recent expression in this oracular notice to Mr. Hendricks: "He ought to know that as a nominee for president in 1880 he is not a possibility. His route to the White House can only be blazed by Mr. Tilden." Imagine Tilden, that sturdy pioneer, with his stout heart and brawny arm, wielding his ponderous and shining axe, to blaze the way of Hendricks to the White House, while poor old Hendricks, "decrepit with his years," with shaking limbs and lusterless eye, creeps haltingly behind in the path marked out for him by the Stalwart Tilden! The absurdity of the idea suggests mirth rather than serious refutation.

If the republican party were to select a candidate for the democratic party, no one doubts that Tilden would be the man, and the reason why is well illustrated in a recent cartoon in the New York Graphic, now one of the most efficient organs of Grant. This cartoon represents Tilden as a sorry specimen of dilapidated manhood, with Anti (aunty) Tammany buckling on his armor, as he stands ready to mount a weary, sad looking ass, to encounter in the tournament of 1880 the stately form of "the man on horseback," typifing Grant, seen in the distance, waiting for his rival. It is a coarse and malevolent caricature, but it tells the whole story of republican preferance for Tilden, and of the need of more powerful champions than Tilden and anti-Tammany to do battle against Grant and the autocratic principle he represents.

The democratic party does not want Mr. Tilden. It has tried him and borne him to a victory, but in the hour of victory he ignobly quit the field and left it to a conquered foe. No democratic state, not even New York, in any authentic expression of its public opinion, has yet said to Mr. Tilden: "Be again our candidate." No patriotic and far seeing democrat thinks so, or will say so, and he presumes largely on an absence of moral sense in the democratic party, who yet makes for Mr. Tilden a claim for renomination. Mr. Tilden is his own candidate, his own nominee, and his personal retainers, men imbued with his principles and taught in his methods, men who believe in him, or at least profit by a professed belief in him, will work for him, and a mercenary press may clamor for him with affected zeal. Some men, nearest to his hearth and heart, have been willing even to stain their hands with bribery, and to forever dishonor the democratic party, in order to make Mr. Tilden president by virtue of a bribe.

Mr. Tilden is old and very rich, and if half the truth is told of his physical condition, very infirm. The presidency, which by a great mistake of the democratic party, was once within his reach, is no longer so. It may still rise before the long gaze of his restless and insatiate ambition, but it can never be grasped by his senile and feeble hand. In pursuing it he chases an ignus fatuus,

"Which leads to bewilder and dazzles to blind."

Much of Mr. Tilden's true character and history would never have been known or cared for by the public except for the exposures which have followed his effort to be president. His is not a character or career to win a nation's admiration, or to make a page of the great or heroic in history, and the less the world knows of it the better for him. He became governor of New York by the prestige of a victory over Tweed and his ring of thieves. Does any man who knows anything of New York politics, and of Tweed and Tilden, believe that Tweed's character and evil deeds were not known to, or suspected by Tilden long before he joined in the hunt that chased tweed to a just punishment and a dishonored grave? When the moral sense of all parties in New York, and of the whole country, had become shocked by the palpable evidence that Tweed was filling his coffers at the public cost, Tilden—before his associate and coadjutor—awoke to the consciousness that personal capital was to be made for himself by crushing Tweed, and he did his part to crush him, and received his reward in the governorship of New York, and an eclat as a reformer, which made him a democratic candidate for president. It was the first time that the presidency was ever offered to a man whose greatest political achievement was that he had proved himself to be an adroit detective and thief catcher, and it was the misfortune of the democratic party to make such a mistake in 1876.

No Troops at the Polls.

[State Sentinel.]

We like the issue. It has the right ring. The great popular heart throbs in unison with it. It takes the democratic party to the sublimest altitudes to which freemen ever climb. "No troops at the polls" will do for a battle cry. It will answer every demand to rally freemen. It is the Slogan that will call all the clans of highland and lowland to battle. It reaches back to Runnymede, and forward until men's capacity for self government triumphs over the last republican conspirator. It is an evidence that—

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again."

It is a defiant proclamation of the democratic party that returning boards shall not rule; that the destines of this country are not to be shaped and fashioned in the dens of republican conspirators; that the Mammoth Caves of republican perjurers and fraud brokers shall not be protected by federal bayonets; that the Cumberland Gaps of villainy through which republican villains pass on to power are to be closed up, and that hereafter ballots, and not bayonets and bullet, are to rule. The republican party has planted itself squarely in favor of bayonets at the polls. It would shoot down freemen; it would murder suffrage; it would annihilate liberty; it would ostracise free thought; it would exile a free press. It would, like an Ætna, vomit fire and ashes, and bury the republic beneath the debris of its hates. It is confronted to-day by the edict of the democratic party, "No more troops at the polls." The republican party would girdle every precinct with bayonets. It would march freemen to bastiles and dungeons. It would break them upon the wheel. It would crucify them on every hilltop. It would inaugurate a despotism upon the ruins of the republic and poison every fountain of liberty in the interest of centralization. But to-day it is confronted by the democratic party which makes the issue, "No more troops at the polls," no bayonets where freemen vote, no military arrests by partisan supervisors and marshals. The democratic party has placed the republican where it must be forever odious and infamous. There let it stand for freemen to spit upon; to be kicked and cuffed by events; to be stripped of its infamous subterfuges and blackened by its crimes—a despicable and perfidious thing for flings and jeers; to be scorned and despised, loathed and denounced—the offspring of hate; the embodiment of perfidy; the synonym of all that is abhorent to virtue—of all that is blasphemous of liberty; of all that is inimical to patriotism, and all that is blind to justice—a party whose jackscrews of lies and whose derricks of perjury raised Hayes to power, and made it possible, in the high noon of the nineteenth century, to lift his crime cursed arm against the liberties of the American people.

Did Not Care a D—n.

Grant is a military man, a firm believer in military power, and with very little respect for constitutions or for traditional usages. He longs to be a king. He would be better pleased if the delegations from our legislature add the legislature of Pennsylvania and other bodies which are to welcome him home were to lay at his feet a crown, and ask his acceptance of it.

Grant, if elected a third time, will never leave the White House again voluntarily.

Let the people heed this warning.—New York Sun.

To which the Indianapolis Sentinel adds:

The above, taken alone, might perhaps, be regarded as the illy digested opinion of one who has never been very friendly to General Grant, but in connection with it, we wish to call to the mind of our readers some other matters. Grant certainly has had "very little respect for constitutions." It was only last week that a senator of the United States (Randolph, of New Jersey) arose in the Senate and declared that on one occasion when Grant was president, upon being referred to a decision of the supreme court, replied, that he did not care for the supreme court. At the time that General Grant gave utterance to the patriotic sentiment, it was currently rumored, and that without contradiction, that his exact language was, "he didn't care a d—n for the supreme court." Again, during the latter portion of the contest for the presidency, in February, 1877, there was a substantial fear among the more patriotic of both parties that he, Grant, was too eager to surround the national capitol with troops, and the suggestive material of bold coup d'etats. The Jacobinical leaders of radical republicanism declared that they preferred Grant to either Tilden or Hayes, and the suspicion was abroad in the land that in the event of a failure to seat Hayes, that sufficient cloud and commotion would be produced to give Grant an excuse for remaining in possession of the presidency with the help of Sherman and the army The only fear on the part of those conspirators was that the army could not be depended upon; that as Grant "did not care a d—n for the 'supreme court,' the army "did not care a d—n" for Grant. In addition to these incidents and recollections of Grant's career, we remind our readers of the grave and sober apprehensions of General Frank Blair, who knew Grant well, and who on more than one occasion referred to the well dissembled ambitious inclinations of Grant. General Blair, in cautious and well digested language, intimated very strongly that Grant would not need much argument to persuade himself that he was the divinely appointed life ruler of this country, and all that was needed was seemly time and circumstance to fasten himself in Washington as a permanent president. A king, dictator, or emperor would sound harsh, but some smooth alliterative title, as "permanent president," would sugarcoat the pill, and we have little doubt but that the advanced hosts of republicanism would gulph it down with but little or no grimacing. The entire brood of third-termers need strangling now, promptly, or the next issue will be four-termers, until they and the country end with life-termers.

A Specimen of Turkish Justice.

Three years ago a young Christian Maronite in Turkey killed a Mussulman in a hot-headed quarrel. After lying ever since in prison the mother of the victim came forward last February and insisted on his being sentenced to death. What followed the Constantinople correspondent of the Philadelphia Press thus describes: "As the crime was proven according to local judicial forms, she obtained from Midhat Pasha the governor of Syria, a firman for the execution, and a day was fixed for the hanging. In vain the notables of all creeds and races, Mussulmans and Christians, appealed to the old woman to be merciful, for upon her word depended the life of the Maronite. They represented to her that if he did do the deed it might have been in self-defense; that at any rate his guilt was not perfectly clear; that he had already grievously suffered in body and mind by his imprisonment, and that the people of Beyrout did not want a capital execution in their midst. Neither the Turkish Ulemas, the Greek and Armenian bishops or the Turkish officials could soften the obdurate heart of this cruel megara. 'I have the firman for his execution,' she said, 'and his fate is in my hand. I will not spare him.' In the night of February 5, three hours after midnight, he was taken from his cell and led to the place of execution. An immense crowd of people gathered around the scaffold. There took place a scene of the most extraordinary kind. The woman was told by the executioner that the man's relatives were ready to pay her any sum in their power if she would, as custom authorized, allow him to go free on the payment of blood money. She shrieked and foamed for vengeance. For an hour or more she refused to be merciful, notwithstanding the entreaties of the mass of men, women and children. In the meanwhile the young man stood on the gallows with the halter about his neck, trembling for his life. Finally, worn out by the prayers of the people, and tempted by the high figures to which the relatives of the Maronite had run up the bid for his life, she consented to accept 3,000 francs as blood money. The hangman let go his hold of his expected victim, and handed him over to his relatives, who carried him off amid the acclamations of the spectators.

Green Food for Short Pastures.

[National Live Stock Journal, Chicago.]

At each recurring season there are many dairymen who have determined to abandon the old system of stinting their cows to the pasture, whether abundant or deficient, and to make such provisions as will enable them to give full feed, whether their pastures are short or not. A large class of dairymen have come to the conclusion that milk is made from food and not from faith or any miraculous power in the cow to create it out of nothing. And since milk represents food, they begin to see that the cow which can digest the largest amount of food will pay the most profits; and, therefore, they are not seeking small eaters, but cows that can turn the most grass and grain into milk.

If the farm is well stocked with cows it seldom happens that the pasture is not short at some period in the season; and if it has a large proportion of pasture to the number of cows, then there will be considerable grass not eaten off at the flush, and when the season is dry these uneaten spots will be so tough that cows will eat very little of the grass. It is better in the early part of the season to have cows enough to eat the grass down about even all over the pasture, for it then furnishes more food as the season advances. But the dairyman should make provision early in the season for any deficiency that may happen in his pasture; and for this purpose oats is one of the best crops to feed green, and they should be sown early so as to be used, if necessary, in July. The oat is as well adapted to produce milk as clover, but to be at the best it should be fed in the milk. It is the most palatable and nutritious. Milk is a highly nitrogenous body, and, therefore, oats, clover, and most of the grasses furnish the right food for it. The oats should be sown upon good ground, so as to make a large growth, and produce from eight to ten tons of green food to the acre. This will be ready to feed before corn or millet, and will come in at the first period of short pasture. If cows are milked in the stable, give a feed of green oats night and morning. Two or three weeks after sowing the oats, sow another piece of ground to oats and peas, to be fed when the peas are in blossom, and this feeding may be continued while the peas are green. Next sow millet or Hungarian grass, but these fine seeds must have soil in fine tilth. At the proper season put in a piece of corn (Stowell's evergreen is the best) in drills 32 inches apart, so that it may be cultivated, and this will come later and may be fed when in tassel. Second cuttings of clover should be fed with the corn to make the best green rations. If all of these crops are put in it will not require more than one acre of oats to 12 cows—the same of each of the other crops—and there will probably be a surplus left, but this surplus can be cut for winter fodder, and cured like hay. By following this plan cows may be made to yield steadily and well all through the season. When a dairyman has once begun the full feeding saytem he will never go back to scanty feeding again.

Suggestions for May.

A systematic arrangement of the labor of the farm, so as to be certain of the performance of specified duties on certain days, would be a desirable end; but as such a course is impossible to carry out, because of the many unforeseen circumstances that continually attend the farmer's work, he must only employ every moment to good advantage.

With the early dawn he should be at work, planting corn, potatoes, sorghum, etc., as well as preparing ground for other crops. Corn ground should receive thorough preparation and the seed planted in straight, even rows; half a pint of tar to a peck of seed corn will secure it from the crows.

Increase the feed of fattening beeves a few pounds each day, and as soon as grass is high enough, let them graze a short time daily, but avoid a too sudden change to such succulent diet.

Remove earth and manure from around buildings; if any have settled unevenly, straighten up at once.

Don't permit stray gamesters from neighboring cities to hunt the little songsters from among your trees, but rather by kindness win the birds to tarry around your homesteads, for they devour legions of insects that are preparing to injure trees and fruit.

Young calves should have dry, comfortable yards, with shelter. Two may at times be profitably raised by one cow. Raw meal is so loosening that it will be found advantageous to cook it before being mingled with milk or other nourishment intended for them.

A good field of carrots may be planted, and will prove a most valuable addition to the winter feed.

Have good sharp hoes for hands; decide on what implements you will need during harvest time, and apply for them; husband manure; buy hay rather than pasture-mowing lands; sow onions early, four pounds of seed to the acre, fourteen inches apart; keep poultry out of the garden.

THE OKOLONA DODGE.

Something About the Ridiculous Mississippi Imitation of Brick Pomeroy.

[To the Editor of the Courier-Journal.]

Will you permit a stranger, whom the exigencies of business have for a few days made a sojourner in this place—this pleasant but unpretentious little town of Okolona, Miss.—to give to the world through the columns of your widely-read paper a few items of information concerning the true status of that inconsequential and obscure little sheet here published, and until recently quite unknown to fame, yclept the "Southern States?" Knowing the wide circulation that is being given to its idiotic ravings by the gloating Republican press of the North, and knowing also as one Southern born and reared, and an humble soldier of the Lost Cause, whose intercourse with the people of the South has been constant and unrestricted, and who claims to know something of true Southern sentiment, that the said paper in its recent wild and senseless rantings represents nothing and nobody but itself, I have taken upon myself to interview a number of the leading citizens of Okolona on this subject, and they assert without exception and without hesitation that the States newspaper does not reflect the sentiments of the people of this town or this section, or of any other section; in fact, has no following and no influence here, and represents nobody but its two editors, Harper and Kernan. Kernan is a carpet-bagger from somewhere in Ohio, and when that is said the theme is exhausted, as he and the people—the white people—of this bailiwick don't "amalgamate" extensively, so to speak. Harper has always been regarded as an eccentric, harmless, windy old blather-skite, whose highest aim and object, like his great prototype, Brick Pomeroy, is notoriety, at whatever cost. Politically he has long been in antagonism to the democratic party, in consequence of his repeated failures to receive office or any sort of recognition at their hands, and he has been heard to say that he would yet "break the party up," which accounts for the milk in his sickly little cocoanut. His affiliations and associations are all with the "opposition" in this state, under whatever name known, its present cognomen being the "Greenback party," with which he is openly and closely identified, the "Greenback" party in the South being looked upon as identical with the republican party in the North. His paper, which is one of the regulation Yahoo-swamp patent-outsiders, has, I am further assured, never received the support, indorsement or official patronage of the democratic party of this county, the Chickasaw Messenger being the official paper of the county and the only recognized reflex here of democratic sentiment. Each issue of this delectable sheet (the States) is now filled with extracts culled from the republican papers of the North commenting in rapturous terms upon its silly effusions, and the editor, I am told, takes it around among his acquaintances in the town, points to these numerous highly-flavored extracts with a grin and a chuckle, boasting the while of the rich rumpus he is kicking up and the big noise his paper is making in the world. The citizens of this town and county wish it known that they would before have taken steps to express in a public and unmistakable way their emphatic repudiation of the States and all its belongings, but utter insignificance of the paper at home they never supposed that any importance would be attached to its utterances abroad The reference to it in some of the Northern journals as "a leading and influential paper of the South" is what Josh Billings would call "sarkasm biled down." But small matter, that. The farce will be kept up all the same, and when the Okolona whangdoodle again lifteth up his voice you will hear the eagle scream.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

A BOSTON dispatch says the Laconia National Bank, of Laconia, N. H., was entered by burglars, and notes, bonds and money representing upward of $150,000 were taken away.

A DESPERATE attempt was made by two burglars to rob the Allegheny (Pa.) Savings Bank in broad daylight, last week. The cashier, who was alone in the bank, tackled the villains single-handed. He wrested a revolver from one of them, and fired three shots at the thieves, putting them to flight. They succeeded in getting away with about $1,500, and made good their escape.

THE WEST.

FOUR large warehouses, with their contents, on Kinzie and State streets, Chicago, were destroyed by fire last week. Loss about $90,000.

A VERY notable murder trial has just been concluded at Chicago, having lasted eighteen days. In July of last year a young man named Peter E. Stevens, fired by jealousy, shot and killed his wife, a girl of 16 years. In due course of time he was indicted and arraigned for trial. For counsel Stevens engaged Storrs and Trude, probably the two shrewdest, if not ablest, criminal lawyers in Chicago. They set up the insanity plea, and labored with masterly ingenuity to convince the jury that the murderer was insane at the time of committing the deed; but without success. A verdict of manslaughter, with fourteen years in the penitentiary, was rendered. No sooner was the decision of the jury rendered in the court than Mrs. Young, the mother of the murdered woman, who had been a constant attendant at the trial, leveled a revolver at the head of Stevens and pulled the trigger, but, fortunately, a corner of a handkerchief which the would-be murderess held in the same hand that grasped the weapon was caught by the hammer, the cap failed to explode, and the intended-victim's life was saved.

S. D. RICHARDS, the butcher of Peter Anderson and the Haralson family, was hanged at Minden, Kearney county, Neb., on the 26th of April. The law of Nebraska provides that executions shall be private, and that not over ten persons shall be admitted. For this purpose a frame inclosure sixteen feet square had been built. Two thousand people were on the ground, and, amid loud shouts, the inclosure was torn down, so the execution was public. After this demonstration, the crowd was orderly....A Helena (Montana) dispatch says the country north of the Yellowstone is full of small bands of Sioux, who swoop down on the settlements every day or two and steal many horses.

CHICAGO elevators contain 6,447,343 bushels of wheat, 2,977,996 bushels of corn, 358,680 bushels of oats, 164,354 bushels of rye, and 398,687 bushels of barley, making a grand total of 10,285,050 bushels, against 2,861,649 bushels at this period last year....Gen. Butler offers to divide up his 20,000 acres of land in Wisconsin into small farms and let them be occupied by negroes who emigrate from the South.

H. H. HOUGHTON, formerly editor of the Galena Gazette, and ex-Minister to the Sandwich islands, died at his home in Galena, Ill., last week. Mr. Houghton was the oldest editor in the Northwest, having been engaged in the newspaper profession for fifty years.

THE white squatters are to be ejected from the Indian Territory at any cost. Orders have been issued to Gen. Pope to furnish all the troops required for the purpose.

THEODORE B. WEBER and Mrs. Robert, of Chicago, had a lawsuit. Weber was getting the best of it. The two met in a law office, by appointment of attorneys, to take testimony in the case, and while this was going on Mrs. Robert drew a pistol and shot Weber, inflicting a mortal wound.

THE SOUTH.

A DISPATCH from Vidalia, Concordia parish, reports that 3,000 negroes are on the river bank awaiting transportation Kansasward. At New Orleans the Migration Relief Association (colored), of Louisiana, has formally organized.......Extraordinarily heavy rains throughout Texas have caused the streams to overflow. Railroad tracks and bridges are washed away, and traffic is entirely suspended. At Houston the water rose eighteen feet in three hours, carried away all the railroad bridges and many warehouses along the banks of Buffalo bayou. The damage is great.

GEN. JAMES P. BROWNLOW, late cavalry officer of the Federal army, and a son of ex-Senator Brownlow, died at Knoxville, Tenn., last week.

REPORTS from Texas say that the Kiowa Indians are killing herders and running off stock in the Pecos river country....A fire at Durant, Miss., destroyed ten buildings.

A LETTER from Gen. McMillan, Postmaster of New Orleans, to a firm in St. Louis, expresses the belief that the exodus of negroes from the Valley of the Mississippi has reached such an impetus that it cannot be stopped. The same belief has evidently taken hold upon the planters and merchants of the Lower Mississippi, as they are taking steps toward organized effort to induce the negroes to remain, to bring back those who have gone, or, failing in both, to fill the vacancy created in labor supply by the introduction of Chinamen if necessary.

Two children, little girls aged 3 years and 8 months respectively, were burned to death.

MRS. SARAH J. HALE, for half a century editress of Godey's Lady's Book, died at her home in Philadelphia last week.

WASHINGTON.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says that "Senator John A. Logan has been challenged to mortal combat by W. M. Lowe, a Greenback Congressman from Alabama. The trouble grew out of a statement of Lowe to the effect that Logan, in 1861, raised recruits for the Confederate service. Logan will pay no attention to the challenge."

THE row between Senator Logan, of Illinois, and Congressman Lowe, of Alabama, caused something of a sensation at Washington. It grew out of an interview between Lowe and a Pittsburgh reporter, in which the former said that Logan aided in raising recruits for the Confederates at the beginning of the late war. Logan gave publicity to a card characterizing the statement as "false and slanderous." Lowe thereupon addressed the Illinois Senator a note asking him whether the words "false and slanderous" were applied to him. Receiving no reply, a second note was addressed to Logan, again demanding an explanation. Still no answer. Then a third note was sent by the Alabama Congressman, demanding that he, Logan, name some place out of the District of Columbia where another communication would reach him. This, of course, implied that a challenge to mortal combat was the next thing in order. This note was treated in the same manner as the two preceding ones, with silent contempt. Then the irate Lowe comes out in the newspapers with a "card," in which, after giving the notes he had addressed to Logan, he says: "Thus ended this one-sided correspondence, which explains itself. It needs little or no comment from me. I will not brand John A. Logan as a liar, for he is a Senator of the United States. I will not post him as a scoundrel and poltroon, for that would be in violation of local statutes; but I do publish him as one who knows how to insult, but not how to satisfy, a gentleman, and I invoke upon him the judgment of honorable men of the community." Thus the matter rests at this writing. At Washington it is not believed the affair will go any farther, as Lowe is satisfied with his card, and Logan expresses indifference as to how many cards may be written.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Army Appropriation bill was finally passed by the Senate on the 25th, by a strict party vote—41 Democrats to 30 Republicans. Several amendments were offered by the Republicans, all of which were voted down.——In the House debate on the Legislative bill was resumed, and a number of members delivered themselves of speeches.

The long debate in the House on the Legislative Appropriation bill was brought to a close on the 26th of April, and the measure passed with the political amendments in it, substantially as it came from the committee. Mr. Garfield's amendment to strike out all the political amendments was rejected by a vote of 121 yeas to 180 nays, and finally the bill was passed by a second vote of 140 yeas to 119 nays. All the Republicans voted in the negative. All the Greenbackers except Barlow, of Vermont, and Kelley, of Pennsylvania, voted with the Democrats for the bill.——The Senate was not in session.

The Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill was reported in the Senate on the 28th ult., as it came from the House, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Mr. Pendleton delivered a lengthy speech in support of his bill relative to inviting members of the Cabinet to take seats upon the floor of the Senate, and participate in the debates relating to their respective departments. The bill repealing certain clauses in the Sundry Civil Appropriation act of March 3, 1879, and making appropriations for the extension of military telegraph lines, and rescinding the authority of the Secretary of War to lease the water-power at Moline, Ill., was passed. Mr. Pendleton introduced a bill to increase the educational facilities and establish normal training schools for the benefit of Indian tribes who have educational claims on the United States. Mr. Williams introduced a bill to regulate the legal value of metal money, and to provide for the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver bullion, and to restore coin to circulation.——The House was not in session.

Neither house of Congress transacted any business on the 29th ult. The Senate had been in session but a short time when the death of Representative Clark, of Iowa, was announced. Proceedings were stopped, a committee was appointed to accompany the remains to Iowa, and, as a further mark of respect, the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the President's private secretary made his appearance and delivered the Executive's veto of the Army bill, the document, without being read, was laid upon the Speaker's table. The announcement of the death of Representative Clark was made, a committee was appointed to attend the funeral, and the House adjourned.

The Senate, on the 30th ult., spent two hours in discussing an amendment to a bill appropriating money to defray the expenses of the extra session of Congress allowing mileage to the members of both branches. The amendment was finally defeated, and the bill was passed. The bill to prevent the introduction of contagious and infectious diseases in the United States was then taken up and discussed.——In the House, the President's Message vetoing the Army bill was read and entered upon the journal. The following bills passed: Appropriating the requisite amount to pay J. B. Eads the sums due, and to become due, for constructing jetties at South pass; amending the section of the Revised Statutes prescribing a penalty for conspiracy against the United States. Mr. Le Fevre, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill to prevent the importation of diseased cattle and spread of infectious diseases among domestic animals. Printed and recommitted.——The Democratic members of the House, immediately after the adjournment, met in caucus to consider what further action should be taken by the Democratic party concerning the two appropriation bills after they shall both have been defeated by Presidential vetoes. After an animated discussion, it was determined to refer the whole subject to the caucus committees of the House and Senate, which originally framed the political sections in controversy. The National Greenback members of the House also held a caucus of three hours' duration on the subject of the Presidential veto. A general interchange of views occurred, but no definite action was reached as to what course they should pursue.

The Senate was engaged in the discussion of the bill to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases in the United States, on the 1st inst., but reached no decision upon the subject.——In the House, the President's message vetoing the Army bill was read, and the Speaker put the question whether the bill should pass, notwithstanding the veto. On passing the bill over the veto, the vote was—ayes, 120; noes, 110, so the bill failed for want of a two-thirds vote.——The two committees appointed respectively by the House and Senate Democratic caucuses to report what course of action should be adopted in view of the Presidential vetoes, past and prospective, held a joint meeting, but arrived at no definite understanding as to what course would be pursued.

Boy Shepherds in Nebraska.

One pleasant day we rode twenty miles over the Laramie plains, from Laramie City to the Little Laramie river, where we found a prosperous sheep-raiser from Nebraska, named Edward Farrell. There were no neighbors for miles around, with the exception of a nephew of Motley, the historian, who had left his father's pleasant home, near Boston, Mass., and located a sheep ranch close by here. The Farrells gave us a most hospitable reception. We bade them good-by late in the afternoon, turned off to the right of Sheep mountain, and, entering a narrow plain between high ranges of hills, spurred forward our jaded animals, until the gathering shadows warned us that we could proceed no further with safety.

At daybreak we spied a large flock of sheep in a corral close by a rude cabin, or dugout, in which were two boys, sons of Mr. Farrell. Here, twelve miles or more from home, they had been tending a flock of 2,300 sheep during the entire season. They shot their game with an old rifle, did their own cooking, and lived entirely alone with their dogs and two ponies employed in herding the sheep. They alternated in watching the sheep, which were driven into the corral every night, as a protection against bears, wolves and other wild animals. An antelope, which one of them had shot the day previous, was suspended near the door of the cabin. There was a good range here, and the father had in the springtime sent the sheep and the boys to possess it.

You will be surprised when I tell you that these lads, intrusted with the care of over 2,000 sheep, and living here in this remote, secluded spot, were only 11 and 13 years of age. It is astonishing, the early self-reliance which these frontier children display, and the skill which, as mere urchins, they attain in herding sheep.—American Agriculturist.

Cricket in England and America.

Hitherto the one great obstacle to the popularizing of this sport in America has been the tedious delays incident to the way of playing the game customary with our English resident cricketers. The adage that "time is money" governs the American people in every phase of their national life, and in nothing so much as in the character and nature of their sports and pastimes. In England, where there is a large class of unemployed people, who, with wealth at command, find time hang heavy on their hands, the style of playing the game of cricket so as to absorb as much of their surplus of leisure time as possible commends itself as quite an attractive feature. But in this country, where the drones of society are decidedly in the minority, and where the busy bees of the community find but little time to devote to recreation, that game which most economizes time, of course, will naturally become popular. The delays incident to cricket to which we especially refer do not belong to the game itself so much as to the loose observance of its rules, and, therefore, the one thing necessary to remove this obstacle to the popularity of cricket is simply to insure a strict observance of the written laws of the game. A feature of cricket which especially commends it as a field sport for gentlemen is, that it can never be made subservient to the evil influences of the class of gambling "sports" who have brought such odium of late years on the national game of ball of Americans. This, together with the fact that it can be played with success at a much later period of life than any other game of ball admits of, gives it an advantage no other field sport possesses.—Brentano's Aquatic Monthly and Sporting Gazetteer.

Leadville.

Leadville, the new Eldorado in Colorado, is built exclusively of wood, and a prediction is current in the city that it will soon be burnt in order to let the carpenters and lumberers build it over again. Two attempts have already been made to burn it; a guest of the Grand Hotel, coming up from dinner, found some shavings in a blaze under his bed, and a lot of boxes and kindling in the rear of a restaurant were lighted, but extinguished by the cook, who happened to step out that way. Still new houses are daily run up as if by magic.

CURE FOR CHILBLAINS.—Slice raw potatoes, with the skins on, and sprinkle over them a little salt, and as soon as the liquid therefrom settles in the bottom of the dish, wash the chilblains with it.

CURE FOR CROUP.—There are many varieties of croup, up to its most dangerous form, according to some, diphtheria, when the whole body becomes infected with the disease, and death generally ensues. Dr. Teste, a physician of standing, reiterates that he has never failed to cure croup by means of bromium since he first employed it twelve years ago. The remedy is simple: The one-hundredth part of pure bromium is dissolved in distilled water. Take every hour, and oftener if necessary, at the commencement of the disease, two or three drops of the solution in a spoonful of sugared water.

HOW A CHRONIC COUGH WAS CURED.—Mr. Donald G. Mitchell was cured of his family tendency to consumption in a curious way. He had a very severe cough when he started to cross from the English shore to the Island of Jersey. "There was no steamer," he says, "and I had to go on a twenty-ton fishing smack. There was a great storm, and for thirty hours we were on the English channel in the roughest weather. I was very sick and lay for a long time on deck covered with a tarpaulin and holding to a mast, expecting every moment to be washed overboard, and not caring much if I was. Finally we reached Jersey, and, strange to say, my cough disappeared. It had been chronic."

SPRAINS.—1. Cold fomentations are useful in sprains, but not until the active inflammation has subsided, and it is required to give tone and strength to the part. The best way of applying them is to put a thick bandage upon the part and keep pouring cold water over it. 2. Beat up an egg to a thick paste, with fine salt; spread it on a cloth and bind it on the part affected. Renew occasionally. 3. Alcohol, one pint; oil of spike, one ounce; origanum, one ounce; camphor, one ounce; spirits ammonia, one ounce. 4. Take one teaspoonful of honey, the same of salt, and the white of an egg; beat all well together for at least an hour—or two would be better. Let it stand an hour. Then anoint the sprained place freely, keep well rolled up with a good bandage.

SULPHUR IN DIPHTHERIA.—Tuesday morning our daughter Nati complained of lame shoulders and neck, accompanied by shooting pains in her head and a slight sore throat, which we supposed to have been caused by taking cold. The second day the disease showed itself to be diphtheria of the malignant type, the parts attacked soon showing putridity, and so far back in the throat that only dry sulphur, partly on sponge, to be carried by the breath, could reach any of the affected parts. I never saw a case in which the fever was so high, or in which the patient lost flesh so rapidly; but on the Sunday following the disease was conquered, the only remedies used being internal applications of sulphur to the affected parts, and external use of cloths wet in tepid or cold water, applied constantly as compresses to reduce the fever. In this case I have tested the great superiority of dry sulphur over mixed, as years ago I tested the futility of alum to conquer this fearful disease; having previously always used burnt alum mixed with sulphur. Not having both at hand, I found the alum used separately made no impression on the spores, while the sulphur alone did what I had supposed to be the joint work of both.—Mrs. Bradner, Redford, Mich.

Mother Carey's Chickens.

The owner of the imposing title, "Thalassidroma Pelagica" is only six inches long, and is the smallest of web-footed birds. Above, its feathers are black, sleek and glossy, with glints of blue; but underneath they are dark brown. Its wings are long, and it flies very swiftly, seldom flapping.

Sometimes it seems to hang in the air with wings outspread, while it runs along the surface of the waves; and from this habit it was named "Petrel" (which means "Little Peter"), after St. Peter, who walked on the water.

When a storm is brewing, although no other sign can be seen by man, the petrels flock together and give loud shrill cries; as if to warn shipmen of coming danger. For this reason, sailors call them "Stormy Petrels." But men of science say that the reason why petrels gather before a storm is that then they catch very easily the sea animals on which they feed. Some observers add that when rain falls the petrels catch the drops, and that this is how they quench their thirst.

These birds are named also "sea-swallows," because their flying is like that of the common swallow.

They are called "Mother Carey's chickens" by sailors; but I have never learned why they got that name, nor who Mother Carey was. I have heard, though, that in the Faroe islands these birds become very fat, and men string them on wicks for use as lamps.

Although the stormy petrel passes most of its life on the wing, it comes ashore to lay its eggs; and these it hides two feet deep, buried in the beach, or in burrows near the tops of cliffs.—"Jack-in-the-Pulpit," in St. Nicholas for May.

French and German Armies.

Side by side with the recovery of her prosperity, France has kept in view the recovery of her military position. Out of a population of 37,000,000, about 704,000 men are in the active army, 510,000 in the reserve, 582,000 in the territorial army, and 625,000 in the territorial reserve—making a total of about 2,400,000 men, all of whom have received some amount of military training. Beside these, there are about 1,830,000 men who, though nominally belonging to the army and liable to serve in certain contingencies, have received no training. Against these figures the Germans have to show in the active army 401,000, in the reserve 500,000, in the landwehr 580,000, and in the landsturm 1,030,000—making in all 2,511,000 men who have received some amount of military training, besides 3,346,000 men who have received no training. In cavalry the Germans have the advantage, the figures for the two countries being 91,000 men and 70,000. In artillery the numerical advantage is with the French, the figures being, for France 2,442 guns, and for Germany 2,124 guns. The immense drain of labor which the maintenance of this army must impose upon France is in addition to, not in lieu of, a drain of money. The army estimates now reach $142,500,000 yearly.—New York Sun.

How Gen. Hardee Learned a New Point in Tactics.

Gen. Hardee, whose manual of infantry tactics was in use in all the Southern armies, visited a rural Georgia town one day during the war, and the commander of a "second-class militia" company sought to do himself and the General honor by parading his command in front of the inn in which Hardee had rooms. The writer upon tactics came out upon the balcony to review the command, and the militia officer put his men through their paces. In one of the maneuvers the men became confused, and got into a hopeless tangle. Hardee, in telling the story, said that he could think of no possible way in which they might be extricated, and waited with great curiosity to see what the militia commander would do. That rural tactician looked at the confused mass for a moment with a scowl of perplexity upon his forehead; then his face cleared, and he shouted the order:

"Disentangle to the front; march."

Whereupon the men rushed forward and formed a new line without regard to the order of the old one. Hardee said the command was not in his own or any other book on tactics, but that it ought to be.

Trout.

Eastern trout do not thrive in the waters of California. All the coast streams have been stocked with them, but they soon died out. This is ascribed to the sandstone formations through which the streams run, and which make the waters muddy. In some of the clear mountain streams, which run through slate and granite formations, the fish do well. The California Fish Commission corroborates this theory by its experience with Eastern trout in San Leandro lake. They had just distributed 20,000 of the fish, about 3 weeks old, when heavy rains came and made the waters muddy. The result was that three-fourths of the trout died, and the rest were saved only by being removed to clear water.

Equine Eccentricities.

At Ward's Corners, Delaware county, Iowa, Alfred Bush owns a French stallion. Since he purchased the animal, the latter has shown a most vicious temper, and is unsafe and dangerous to handle. Mr. Bush has a son about 2 years old, for whom the horse has formed a great attachment, and the two frolic together strangely. The boy will put his little hands in the horse's mouth, pull out his tongue, seize his tail and swing with it, climb up his legs—in fact, do whatever his childish freaks prompt. For hours they thus play together, the horse apparently enjoying it as well as the boy, and, what is singular, the horse will allow none to come near while the boy is with him, and is especially cautious about injuring the boy himself.

Kentucky Justice.

Samuel Holmes' case shows what a travesty can be made of Kentucky law. That desperado rode into Stanford, Ky., some years ago, and killed the Sheriff, who interfered with his drunken carousals. Holmes at once left for parts unknown, but returned to Kentucky two years ago and was arrested. At his first trial eleven of the jury favored hanging and one five years in the penitentiary. At the second trial seven wanted to hang Holmes and five to give him a long term of imprisonment. Finally, after the State and county have spent $10,000 on the case, a third jury has deliberated seventy hours and given the murderer two years in the penitentiary.

An Otter Caught with a Hook.

Mr. Bussey had some set-hooks in the river one night last week. During the night a trout went for the alluring bait and was hooked. Afterward an otter came along and concluded to take in the trout. The first pass he made he fastened the hook in his mouth and there he hung until morning. When Mr. B. came and raised the pole the otter plunged through the water at a terrific rate, but the hook and line were strong and held him for some time. At last he came on land and, before Mr. B. could kill him, he had run around a tree, broke the hook and made his escape. The trout was not damaged much.—Valdosta (Ala.) Times.

Insanity in Russia.

According to statistics recently collected by the Government of St. Petersburg, there are in Russia about 100,000 insane persons. The Russian papers have been complaining of the bad condition and management of the insane asylums, which in most cases are of the nature of barracks rather than of hospitals. The Russian medical organs have also been taking the ground that insanity should be legally recognized as sufficient cause for divorce, since it is a transmissible disease.

Maj. André.

Cyrus W. Field has purchased the ground where Maj. Andre was executed, and will mark the spot with a stone bearing an inscription prepared by Dean Stanley. He says it is merely a historical matter, and that he would do the same thing for Satan, if he should be executed, just for the historical interest of the thing.

A FRENCH surgeon has performed a remarkable feat in the art of the transplantation of teeth. He extracted an incisor (projecting under the tongue) in the lower jaw of a young man of 26, and planted it in the upper jaw in place of a decayed tooth just removed. In a few weeks the tooth was firmly fixed. This successful experiment opens up a new field for dentists.

PERSONALS.

ALL the Davenport family are now on the stage.

ROBERT BROWNING and Mrs. Stowe are each 66 years old.

MADAME BONAPARTE'S jewels have been appraised at $70,000.

CARDINAL MCCLOSKEY sold his New York residence for $60,000.

W. H. VANDERBILT'S income is estimated at $18,000,000 a year.

PHILADELPHIA is the only city where editors grow to be very old.

POPE LEO does not like to give audience to promiscuous strangers.

MR. JOHN KEATS, the poet's nephew, is a civil engineer in Missouri.

THE Khedive of Egypt has twelve children, distributed among four wives.

THERE is a rumor that Dean Stanley is about to join the Roman Catholic Church.

THE Iowa banker, B. F. Allen, lives at Leadville, in a log cabin 15x20 feet in dimensions.

DR. MCCOSH, the President of Princeton College, has just become a citizen of the United States.

OAKLAND, Cal., is getting up a regiment which shall escort Grant from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

NO GERMAN Emperor has hitherto lived as long as the present sovereign. Next to him comes Frederick III., who died in 1493, aged 78.

ROBERT ALSTON, a son of the assassinated Georgian, has been made messenger of Senator Gordon's Committee on Commerce, receiving a salary of $1,440.

ON his 95th birthday, the Rev. Dr. Lovick Pierce, the distinguished Methodist preacher, of Georgia, baptized five great-grandchildren and one great-great-grandchild.

THE family of Secretary of War Stanton is all broken up, and one daughter is the only remaining child. The last son died a year ago, after making a brilliant reputation as a lawyer in Washington.

EDWARD CLAY, a Richmond barber, attempted the other day to eat twelve soda crackers in as many minutes. When the time was up he had disposed of ten crackers only. Besides, it took him a quarter of an hour to get unchoked.

JAMES KEETOR, a farmer of Norfolk county, Va., went out plowing, one day last week, a poor man and went home rich, having struck an iron chest that contained several thousand dollars in gold coin—probably buried there by somebody during the Rebellion.

ANNA LEWIS chased a neighbor in Cincinnati, firing at him as she ran, until she had emptied the seven chambers of a revolver, when she loaded the weapon and fired seven times more—all without hitting him, although his clothing was perforated.

ANDREW CAMPBELL, the slayer of the rebel raider John Morgan, is alive and well, living at Bloomington, Ind. He lived on a farm in Arkansas about five years after leaving the service, and then struck out for New Albany, Ind. He was born in the County Antrim, North of Ireland.

His Weak Spot.

A young man who prides himself on his witticisms, and who unfortunately happens to be addicted to drink once in a while, recently became acquainted with a young lady at a friend's house. Hoping to show his wit, he graciously inquired:

"Miss ——, how do you like Mr. Wright?"

"Mr. Wright? What Mr. Wright?" mused the young lady.

"Why, the man who always does right," he replied, with a simper.

"Oh, yes, I see! and you, sir," she added, quickly, "how do you like Mr. Hall?"

"Hall? What Hall do you mean?"

"Why alco-Hall," she said.

The young man has since reformed.

THE New York elevated railroad has begun the erection of a third track, to be placed between the other two, and on which down trains will be run in the morning and up trains in the afternoon thus giving additional accommodation to the crowds that throng the road at that time.

ODIOUS ELECTION LAWS.

Reasons Why They Should Be Repealed.

Their Tendency to Abridge the Rights and Privileges of Citizens.

Hon. Daniel W. Voorhees in the United States Senate.

Sir, these laws are not the offspring of that great instrument which has descended to us with ever-increasing strength and glory from the days of our Revolutionary ancestors. They emanate rather from that malignant spirit of political oppression and tyranny which preceded the French Revolution, and caused its fires at last to break forth; which filled the prisons of France with victims arrested on secret orders, and made every citizen tremble as one who fears a blow in the dark. They emanate from the spirit which ruled over Venice, when a whisper or a look of suspicion was more to be dreaded than the blow of a dagger, and when the silent and voiceless accusation doomed its object to walk the Bridge of Sighs into the caverns of a ruthless and lingering death. In English history there never was a period in which they could have been executed. Charles the First lost his head, James the Second his throne, and George the Third his American colonies in attempting far less encroachments on the liberties of Englishmen than these laws perpetrate on the liberties of Americans. Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, suspended a sword by a single hair over the heads of his guests at a banquet, and enjoyed their terror. The party but yesterday in power in this Chamber has suspended over the heads of the American people and put into operation in their midst enactments far deadlier than the sword; for without the unassailable safeguards of personal liberty life itself is of no value. The Senator from Maine [Mr. Blaine] has urged that opposition to these enactments is a false issue on the part of those who have not felt their cruel enforcement. He asserts that because the Federal election laws have not been called into active execution in some portions of the country, and troops have not been placed at all the polls, therefore the people have no reason for resentment. The Tories of the Revolution argued the same way 100 years ago on the Stamp act and the tax on tea. They insisted that the claim of right to bind the colonies in all things put forth by the British Parliament could do no harm, and ought to be submitted to as long as no attempt was made to enforce it. But it was that very claim of right which made the Revolution. It was not the amount of the tax collected, or even demanded, that caused the sword of Bunker Hill to be drawn. It was the naked assertion of a principle subversive of local self-government which drove the colonists to armed resistance and kept the army of the Revolution in the field under Washington until American independence was secured. Our fathers were unwilling for a claim of despotic power to hang over them as a threat liable at any time to be put in execution. They revolted against the idea that they were to hold their rights subject only to the forbearance of their rulers. They resented the menace of the British Government contained in its declaration of power as they would a personal indignity. Burke, in his speech of March, 1775, on conciliation with America, thus describes the colonists:

"In other countries the people, more simple and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze."

This was the sublime sentiment of liberty which inspired Jefferson and John Adams, Patrick Henry and John Hancock; which welded together the toil-worn and destitute veterans of Virginia and Massachusetts in many a bitter and bloody charge. The sound of the clanking chains of political bondage was heard in the distance, and it was enough. They did not sit supinely and heedlessly until the manacles were fastened on their limbs. Are their descendants of this day so degenerate that they will wait until the hand of power clutches them by the throat and hurls them into prison before they will turn and destroy the laws which provide for such debasement? Shall we salute with reverence the tokens of tyranny, the emblems of our enslavement? The Swiss peasant refused to bow his uncovered head to the cap of the Austrian tyrant elevated as a sign of subjugation; and the hearts of brave men and fair women in all the four quarters of the globe have poured incense to the name of William Tell. John Hampden thought 20 shillings of ship-money too dear a price to pay for security, ease, peace, and life itself, as long as the prerogative to levy such a tax was claimed by the King; and he yielded up his peerless spirit on the plains of Chalgrave in defying an unjust principle of government. Notwithstanding the derision of the Senator from Maine, all history attests the danger of leaving instruments of usurpation and oppression ready for the use of those intrusted with executive authority. The usurper will come at last. The hour of his advent is inevitable. The temptations of supreme and arbitrary power have never yet failed to develop a Cæsar, a Cromwell or a Napoleon, whenever the people have relaxed their vigilance and suffered their laws to pave the way toward despotism.

But in the present instance we have vastly more than the mere menace or threat of future subjugation by virtue of the laws under discussion. We are not left to conjecture what will be done hereafter. Already these laws have been executed over the prostrate forms and liberties of American citizens in a manner and to an extent which would arouse any people in Europe to revolt, except, perhaps, the serfs of Russia. I speak not now of the South, which has so long been considered a legitimate prey to the spoiler, but of the great, dominant, and stalwart North. Look to New York, that mighty emporium of the wealth and commerce of the western hemisphere. Scenes have been enacted there within the last few years which bring shame and disgrace to the republic wherever they are known. John I. Davenport is Chief Supervisor of Elections in the city of New York, appointed by the Circuit Court of the United States. He is also the Clerk of the United States Circuit Court, and a United States Commissioner. With all the powers of these manifold official positions combined in his own person he has indeed been the autocrat of the ballot-box. In the elections of 1876 he had under him 1,070 Supervisors, 2,500 Deputy Marshals, and an indefinite number of Commissioners, at an expense for them and for himself of $94,587.

In 1878 he employed 1,225 Supervisors, 1,850 Deputy Marshals, and Commissioners in proportion, for all whose pay and expenses he drew upon the money of the people in the treasury. In June, 1876, as Clerk of the United States Circuit Court, he issued warrants for the arrest of 2,600 naturalized voters to be brought before him as United States Commissioner and Chief Supervisor for the purpose of making them surrender their naturalization papers. The Federal courts themselves afterward held that the naturalization papers in question were all legal and valid, but the desired result had been accomplished. The terror inspired by these arrests intimidated thousands from going to the polls. It became well known that there was no personal security in New York in connection with the elections, and the poor, the timid, and the humble stayed away. The same course was pursued in 1878. During the summer of that year 9,400 citizens were notified that they would be arrested unless they surrendered their naturalization papers to the head-overseer, John I. Davenport. In the month of October, 1878, 3,100 persons were actually arrested and a reign of terror inaugurated just in advance of the election. The pretense that these persons held fraudulent naturalization papers had already been shown to be false, but it was necessary to party success that an alarm should be raised and a panic created in the minds of foreign-born citizens and of the poor laboring classes generally.

The movement was successful, and it has been estimated that 10,000 legal voters remained away from the polls rather than risk the jails and the prison-pens of the Chief Supervisor and his subordinates. But it was reserved for the day of election itself to give free scope to the frightful powers with which this band of Federal Ku-Klux is invested. Those who braved the dangers which environed the ballot-box, and approached it as if they were still freemen, soon found their mistake. They quickly ascertained that the previous threats and warnings which they had heard were neither idle nor unmeaning. As a specimen of thousands of similar occurrences on election day, I quote a statement recently made by a member of the other branch of Congress from New York. Speaking from his place on the floor, he said:

"A neighbor of a mine, who had resided in the same district for seventeen years, and a soldier of the Union army at that, was arrested. I was asked to go to the Republican headquarters in an adjoining district, whither he had been taken. The street for an entire block was lined with carriages, in which the unfortunate citizens who had fallen into the hands of the Philistines had been or were to be conveyed. When I entered the building I found the front room decorated with the paraphernalia of a political headquarters, and filled with Republican politicians. In the back room a United States Commissioner was holding court. The door was closed, watched by a Cerberus. No one was allowed inside but the prisoners and the Republican managers. After about half an hour's waiting I was informed by the doorkeeper that the man I was looking for was no longer there. I asked whither he had been taken. 'Suppose to Fort Davenport,' was the laconic reply."

Sir, most likely this soldier of the Union army was with Grant in the Wilderness, at Cold Harbor and at Petersburg. Or perhaps he was with Sherman in his march to the sea, and as a soldier of the Army of the Tennessee took part in the bloody battle of Atlanta. Wherever he was, however, and on whatever field he was baptized with fire, he was assured that he was offering his life for the preservation of the Union under the safeguards of constitutional liberty. He was also assured that human slavery should not survive the triumph of the Union cause, and he rejoiced to believe that his country would in fact soon be the land only of the free. What must have been his reflections, therefore, in November last to find, in attempting to cast his ballot, that he was as very a slave in the hands of a brutal overseer as any negro ever driven in a cotton-field, and that he had no more power under existing laws to protect his personal freedom than an African bondsman on the auction-block before the war. Did he not, most probably, conclude that one of the fruits of the war, under the nurture and cultivation of the Republican party, was the extension of slavery, rather than its overthrow and destruction? Was he not impressed with the fact that the liberation of one race had been followed by the enslavement of another? What were his thoughts, and the thoughts of his fellow-victims who had also been his fellow-soldiers, as they lay like felons in prison, in "Fort Davenport," for offering to vote? How did their bitter thoughts in that hour of degradation compare with their glorious dreams as they often lay together in the tented field; when their—

> Bugles sang truce; for the night-cloud had lowered,
> And the sentinel stars set their watch in the sky;
> And thousands had sunk on the ground overpowered—
> The weary to sleep and the wounded to die.

In such an hour as this they dreamed not only of returning to the dear ones at home, of their rapturous, clinging embrace, and burning kiss, but they likewise dreamed of returning to a land of liberty, to homes made free from the invasive steps of the spy and informer, and to a state of personal security under laws of their own making. These bright dreams have all vanished, and in their place the returned soldier, and all others, have embraced a reality as horrible and as unbearable to the soul of a man fit to be free as Dante's conceptions of Inferno are to the Christian mind. The following description of election-day in Davenport's court in New York is said to be but a tame and imperfect presentment of the facts as they there transpire from year to year as the elections occur:

"Such a scene as the rooms of this court presented on that election day has never before been witnessed in this city or in this country, and it is to be hoped never will again. From early morning until after the polls were closed these rooms were packed and jammed with a mass of prisoners and Marshals. Not only were they crowded beyond their capacity, but the halls and corridors with those who were unable to gain admission, so that the counsel representing the prisoners and the bondsmen who were offered to secure their release had the greatest difficulty, and were frequently unsuccessful, in obtaining entrance. In addition to all this was that delectable iron 'pen' on the upper floor, in which men were crowded until it resembled the Black Hole of Calcutta, and where they were kept for hours hungry, thirsty, suffering in every way, until their cases could be reached. With scarcely an exception these men had gone to the polls expecting to be absent but a short time. Many of them were thinly clad; numbers had sick wives or relatives; some were sick themselves. There were carmen who had left their horses standing in public streets; men whose situations depended on their speedy return; men who wished to leave the city on certain trains. Every imaginable vexation, inconvenience, injury and wrong which the mind can conceive existed in their cases, so that it was painful for the counsel who were endeavoring to secure their release to approach sufficiently near the railing to hear their piteous appeals and witness the distress which they had no power to alleviate. And, over all this pushing, struggling, complaining crowd, Mr. Commissioner John I. Davenport sat supreme, with a sort of Oriental magnificence, calmly indifferent to everything but the single fact that no man who was arrested was allowed to vote."

May I not, in view of this dark and shameful picture, appeal to Senators, without impropriety, to know whither we are drifting? Are we still hugging the miserable delusion that there is no danger, while scenes are being enacted in strict accordance with the laws on our statute books which would be a disgrace to Turkish civilization if enacted by the arbitrary authority of the Sultan? Has a fatal lethargy seized the American people, and are we indeed to follow the downward pathway of all the republics that have risen and fallen in the past? The sailor in Northern seas veers off into safer waters the moment he feels the current of the great maelstrom under his keel. We are in the very vortex of the whirlpool wherein every local privilege, every right of citizenship, all the sanctuaries of home, and the ship of state itself, are being drawn down and dashed to pieces, and yet the cry that all is well, uttered by false pilots, lulls us into a sense of security and repose. I call upon my countrymen to awaken, for the hour of mortal peril to their institutions is here. What has happened in New York has happened elsewhere, and may happen everywhere. Shall the laws which make such scenes possible remain in force? I invoke against them the memories of the mighty dead who fell for independence; who enriched the soil of Massachusetts with their blood at Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill; who struggled with Washington at Brandywine, and charged under his eye at Princeton, Trenton and Monmouth; who tasted death at Camden, the Cowpens and Eutaw Springs, in order that we might be free; who yielded up their brave spirits on the plains of Yorktown in the precious hour of final victory. By these great souls, by their privations, sorrows, anguish and pain, I implore the American people not to forget the value of those liberties which are now trampled under foot with every circumstance of scorn and contempt.

At this point, however, and in this connection, another branch of legislation on the subject of popular elections calls for our consideration. In presenting the elaborate and carefully-constructed system of laws for the suppression of self-government, we are next confronted by those provisions which place the land and naval forces of the United States at the polls. Those who conceived and enacted these laws were not content until the sword as well as the purse of the nation was prostituted to the suppression of free elections. I have only to appeal to the laws themselves to make good this statement, strong as it may appear. The section most familiar to the public mind is 5,528 of the Revised Statutes, and is often cited in proof of the harmless purposes of the army. It has, in fact, at a hasty glance, a somewhat innocent aspect, but a moment's inspection will show that, like the Trojan horse, its real object is to carry armed men into a citadel—in this instance the citadel of liberty—without exciting suspicion or resistance. It was enacted in February, 1865, and its language is as follows:

"Every officer of the army or navy or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

Here is simply a cheap display of pretended severity against military interference with elections, while the sole purpose of the section was to authorize the presence of armed troops at the polls under the vague pretext of keeping the peace. Sir, who is to determine the necessity of the presence of the army or the navy at the place of voting on election day to keep the peace? Who is to pass upon this plea of military necessity and give the command to close in on the ballot-box with the bayonet? Under this section it is evident that the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief would have that duty to perform. What a dazzling field here opens for the operations of a usurper! It is a matter of history that Cæsar while in Gaul sent his emissaries to Rome to incite riots and disturbances at the elections in order to give him the pretext he craved, to keep the peace at the polls with his trained legions at his back. Napoleon the Great crushed the liberties of France under the tyrant's usual guise of preserving public order by force of arms; and Napoleon the lesser in our own day followed his example. What a temptation is presented, by the section I have read, to some American Executive to practice the same usurpations! He has only to stir up troubles through his partisan emissaries in the South, as has often been done heretofore, and the occasion is made for the use of the army to any extent he may choose. He is the judge of the number of troops and the time they are to move and the places they are to invest. He may order any number of ships of war into the harbor of New York or in front of New Orleans on election day or at any time before that day to overawe the people, simply avowing that he does so under this law to keep the peace at the polls. It is difficult to conceive that such an enactment could be found among the statutes of a republic, but it is my painful duty to show two others on the same subject far more dangerous, if possible, than this. Section 1,989, found in the Revised Statutes under the title "civil rights," confers on the President in express terms the powers which are implied in section 5,528. There is no attempt here to deceive. The army and navy are boldly placed at the disposal of the President to use at his discretion over a range of subjects and in the control of their details as extensive as the rights of man under a free constitution. The words of the section are as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process issued under any of the preceding provisions, or as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of the provisions of this title."

There are fifteen sections in this title, and they embrace the assertion and enforcement of every right and privilege known to American citizenship. They were prepared and enacted for the purpose of placing the negro on an exact equality in every particular with the white man before the law, and they consequently cover as much ground as the constitution itself. For instance, the first section of this title provides for the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence; and the second section provides for the right to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property. It is made lawful for the President, at his own will and pleasure, and without reference to State laws on these subjects, to launch the army into any State he may choose to crush, under the pretense of enforcing these provisions or preventing their violation. The third section of this title relates to actions at law and suits in equity for damages by such as deem themselves deprived of any rights, privileges or immunities secured by the constitution and laws. The fourth section treats of conspiracies—first, to intimidate persons from accepting and holding office; second, to deter witnesses from testifying in any United States court to influence grand or petit jurors, or in any manner to impede or defeat the due course of justice; and, third, to deprive any class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or to prevent any one from voting for the candidate of his choice. The section concludes by giving a right of civil suit for damages to any one conceiving himself aggrieved under its provisions. Other sections follow of intricate and diversified character, but I have cited enough to show the vast and sweeping scope of the duties devolved on the army and navy by virtue of section 1,989 and the absolute supremacy of one-man power there created. Under the wide and universal provisions of the civil-rights title, which we are now considering, there is not a phase in human affairs wherein the army and navy of the United States cannot be called by the Executive to prevent or to enforce the execution of some act by individuals, States, and Territories. Section 1,989 contemplates the military control of elections not only, but of everything else that belongs to the States, Territories, counties, cities, and every other species of municipality. It utterly abrogates the constitution of the United States. By that instrument, section 4, article 4, the extent of the power of the Federal Government to send troops to a State is defined:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence."

This short and pregnant sentence marks the boundaries, as understood by the fathers, between the Federal Government and the States in regard to the character and enforcement of State constitutions and laws. There has been much confusion of ideas and the wildest vagaries of construction growing out of this clause of the Federal constitution, and especially in relation to that part of it which guarantees to every State a republican form of government. I have heard it contended in debate in Congress that by virtue of this power of guarantee the Federal Government could unseat members of a State Legislature, annul laws of their enactment, direct other members to be sworn in and other laws to be enacted, and in a general and in an especial manner take charge of all local interests. All this, too, was to be upheld and enforced by United States military authority, if necessary. Sir, may it not be well to understand exactly what it is that the Federal Government is called on to guarantee to the States? A republican form of government is something easily defined. The term "republic," as applied to a political organization, is derived from the two Latin words, res, a thing, an affair, and publica, public, meaning a public affair in which all have a common interest, in which there is neither royalty nor rank fixed by law. Webster defines a republican form of government to be:

"A state in which the sovereign power is exercised by representatives elected by the people; a commonwealth."

Taking this as the true meaning of the expression used in the Federal constitution, and we have no difficulty in understanding that when a State has framed and adopted a constitution in harmony therewith, and maintains it, the Federal Government has no more power to interfere with or send armed forces into the State, except upon its own application to resist invasion or to suppress domestic violence, than the State has to assume the functions of the Federal Government. If the Legislature of a State should pass laws repugnant to the constitution or the laws of the United States, which together with treaties are the supreme law, the courts are charged with the duty of arresting them. If riots break out at elections, or on any other occasion, begetting domestic violence which the State cannot put down; or if invasion occurs, and the State calls for assistance in the manner prescribed by the constitution, then and only then can the Government of the United States come to its relief in martial array. A contrary doctrine to this, the doctrine contained in the section under discussion, changes this Government in the twinkling of an eye from a republic to a consolidated military despotism, governed in all parts and details by the army and navy, at the sole behest of the Commander-in-Chief, the President of the United States. There is no more escape from this conclusion than there is from the evidence of our senses that light follows the morning and darkness the night. By this section the President is left to determine everything, and to execute without restraint from any quarter his arbitrary conclusions. He may declare it necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process with the army in any portion of the country, whether it is so or not. He may declare any city of over 20,000 inhabitants, or any county or parish in the United States, in a state of insurrection, station troops in them, proclaim martial law, and cut them off from all communication with other parts of the world.

But there remains one more section authorizing the use of the army and navy to subvert free elections which demands our attention. I turn to it, I confess, with feelings of repugnance. It completes the degradation of that army and navy whose fame and glory fill the whole earth. It shows to what base uses the heroes of a hundred battles may be put by the vaulting ambition of radical partisans. It is section 1,984, and reads as follows:

"The Commissioners authorized to be appointed by the preceding section are empowered, within their respective counties, to appoint, in writing, under their hands, one or more suitable persons, from time to time, who shall execute all such warrants or other process as the Commissioners may issue in the lawful performance of their duties, and the persons so appointed shall have authority to summon and call to their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of the proper county, or such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged; and such warrants shall run and be executed anywhere in the State or Territory within which they are issued."

The warrants or other process mentioned in this section, and which the Commissioners may issue, are such as are provided for the arrest and intimidation of voters before elections, on election day, and afterward. They are such as are contemplated in chapter 7 of the title "Crimes," on which I have already commented. We behold, therefore, by virtue of this most amazing section, the army and navy of the United States, not placed under the command of the President or such person as he may empower, presumably an officer of high rank and character, to regulate and control elections, but ordered to obey the "summon and call" of the lowest agents, and, naturally, the vilest instruments of this whole pernicious business. Let us pause and look for a moment at the scene which is here provided for. The Circuit Courts of the United States and the District Courts of the Territories are authorized by section 1,983 to increase the number of Commissioners from time to time, so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest and examination of persons charged with crimes against the election laws, until the whole land shall swarm with Commissioners bent on the success of their party. Then these Commissioners, appointed for a political purpose, are empowered in every county in the United States to appoint one or more persons whom they deem suitable to execute their process and carry out their edicts. And how astonishing and incredible it seems, in this age of advanced civilization, that these innumerable Deputy Commissioners, these irresponsible sublessees of unconstitutional power, should have, by the express words of American law, the authority to summon and call to their aid, not merely the bystanders and the posse comitatus of the county, but such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States or of the militia as they may consider necessary to the performance of their duties.

Here are the plain words of the law, and there is not a Senator on this floor who will gainsay my statement. Sir, who are these people on whom the most tremendous powers known to human governments have been so lavishly bestowed? I have no word of disparagement for United States Commissioners, appointed to perform the legitimate duties of that useful office, but for political instruments, thrust by partisan hate and ambition into that position, and for those still below them, I have neither respect nor forbearance. The experience of the last few years in the different States, and notably in New York, shows that political Commissioners, their deputies and subordinates, foisted into the control of elections, belong essentially to that class of human pests so powerfully described by Curran in his defense of Rowan, who, in the language of the great Irishman, "overwhelmed in the torrent of corruption at an early period, lay at the bottom like drowned bodies while soundness or sanity remained in them; but at length, becoming buoyant with putrefaction, they rose as they rotted and floated to the surface of the polluted stream, where they were drifted along, the objects of terror and contagion and abomination."

Yet of such as these are made the commanders of the military and naval forces of this Government; to these miserable, cringing camp-followers of any party in power, occupying, as they do, the lowest and most disreputable places in the rear rank of political warfare, the proudest plumed chieftains on land and sea must bow their tall heads and obey their mandates. Will some Senator tell me how the brave and brilliant Sherman, bearing a higher rank than even Washington ever bore, is to escape obedience to a Deputy United States Commissioner? Will some one point out to me how, under the law as it now stands, Sheridan, Hancock, or the Secretary of War himself, is to refuse military subjection and co-operation to any offspring of the political sewer appointed by a United States Commissioner and bearing a warrant or other process for the arrest of a citizen charged with an offense against the election laws? I assert, fearless of contradiction, that under the section I have read the veriest reptile of ward politics, the most abandoned scavenger of party warfare, armed with a Commissioner's appointment and any sort of process against the liberty of an American citizen, can call the whole army and navy to his support, and the tallest heads must bow to his command. The scarred and veteran legions who bore the eagles of the republic in triumph in Mexico and who are yet in the army; the dauntless, chivalric, and generous hearts who closed with their own equal kindred in the mortal grasp of civil war; all these, and others besides, are placed at the beck and nod of a commander selected by a United States Commissioner.

I will not stop to say that this is monstrous. That will be the universal verdict. I will not pause to denounce such laws as wholly infamous, for that will be the judgment not only of the American people but of all the civilized nations of the world. Simply to call up and exhibit such a horrible death's head as this in the laws of a commonwealth pretending to be free is enough to excite the jeers, the hisses, and the execrations of every lover of liberty on the inhabitable globe. The army and the navy of the United States! How often the banquet hall and the festive board have rung with eloquence in their praise! How often their achievements have been the theme of poetry and of song! Whose heart has not swelled with emotion at the mention of Revolutionary fields of fame? Whose eye has not kindled at the story of Lundy's Lane, the Thames, Tippecanoe, and New Orleans? Whose spirit does not feel exalted when Buena Vista, Monterey, Cerro Gordo, Cherubusco, and Chapultepec pass in stately review? And whose eyes have not grown moist and dim with enthusiasm in reading the battles of the ocean, those deadly conflicts of the sea which have made American genius and courage as imperishable in history as the fixed stars are in the heavens over our heads?

Sir, these sentiments are universal in the American heart, but who now will speak the eulogy or sing in heroic verse the deeds of the army and the navy of the United States used to overthrow free elections under the command of Deputy United States Commissioners? Others may answer the question; I cannot. History, however, gives no uncertain answer as to the final result of such legislation. All the free governments of the past have withered away and perished by the introduction of military force into the management of their civil affairs. We will prove no exception to the invariable rule. Even in England, the home of monarchy, governed by Kings and Queens and a hereditary nobility, the people, nearly a hundred and fifty years ago, demanded and enforced the entire absence of troops from the polls on election day, in order that they might preserve their rights, whatever they were, under the British constitution. A committee of this body, on a former occasion, described the objects of the well-known statute of George II. in the following terms:

"It cannot escape notice that the leading object of this ancient statute, as sufficiently evidenced by the preamble, was the preservation of the rights and liberties of the kingdom, not their destruction. And the history of the times shows that the prohibition to keep military forces near places where there was an election of members of Parliament arose from outrages practiced upon the electors by the Ministers in posting troops so as to overawe them and coerce them into the returning of candidates friendly to the Ministerial party, and the supporters of prerogative against popular rights."

This description of the use of the military on election day sounds painfully familiar at this time to American ears. Our ancestors, even in the dark reign of the second George, a century and a half ago, would not brook such outrages upon the electors. Are we, with all the increase of light and liberty in the world, to be denounced for demanding just what they did? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar], in his recent speech, found nothing to censure or disapprove in the use of the army or the navy to control elections. Another Senator from the same State held different views. Daniel Webster declared:

"If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority properly expressed; and above all the military must be kept, according to the language of our bill of rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Wherever this lesson is not learned and practiced there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff, and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for forms of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword."

A Colorado Snake-Story.

Two old hunters and guides met the other day in Denver, Col., and one of them told the following story in the hearing of a News reporter: "Jim and I started out in the mountains, early one morning, after black-tailed deer. We had no luck up to noon, and then found ourselves on the side of a precipitous mountain. The trail was wide and plain, and we soon came to a spring that had burst out of the solid rock. Here we both stopped to get a drink. I used the cup first, and then handed it to Jim. He drank, and stepped aside to take a look down the side of the mountain and in the valley. As he stood thus, his shoulders reached to a level with a shelf of the rock which projected forward some little distance over the trail. As I rose up from the spring, something attracted my attention to this rocky shelf, which was only a few inches from Jim's neck and exactly on a level therewith. To my horror, I saw thereon an immense rattlesnake. The horrible reptile was coiled, his eyes were snapping, his forked tongue protruding and everything indicating an immediate spring. Jim stood perfectly stolid and utterly unconscious of the slightest danger. Any motion on his part, even the slightest, I knew would be instantly fatal. What to do I could not think. I dared not call nor shoot. Everything depended on his remaining perfectly still. After a second's further reflection, I dropped softly down, so as to be out of sight of the reptile. I then moved toward my unconscious friend. Breathlessly I watched him from fear every second he would make some slight movement of the head or body, and any motion I knew meant death. Soon I was near enough to feel that I could get a firm hold. Without another thought or the slightest word or warning, I then grasped Jim by the arm and side and brought him heavily down with a crash upon the trail and among the flinty rocks. As I did this I saw what seemed a flash of light dart out from the rocky shelf, which I knew to be the stroke of the reptile. But my friend's neck was not where the snake had hoped, and Jim was safe.

"And what did Jim say when you slung him down in that style?" asked one of the auditors.

"He commenced cursing me in the meanest sort of way," replied the Major, "till I made him stand up and look at that shelf in the rock. When he saw that, and the snake as well, and saw, too, how near he had been to a horrible death, he turned around and took my hand, but he didn't say anything more, because he couldn't speak. But then we understood each other."

A Tale of the Sea.

The ship Otago, recently arrived at Port Townsend, Washington Territory, reports that in latitude 42:14 north, longitude 129:37 west, she sighted a schooner, water-logged and dismantled. One man, a Portuguese, Victorine Roper, was found on board, lashed to the wreck, alive, but insensible. On recovering he stated that the schooner left San Francisco about a month ago, bound north on a trading voyage. Six days out the vessel was thrown on her beam-ends, and partly filled. She did not right till the masts gave way. Of eleven persons on board, five were drowned in the forecastle. The Captain was swept from the deck and lost. The mate and remainder of the crew lashed themselves on the top-gallant forecastle, where, one by one, they died, the last one expiring on the day Roper was rescued.

Badly Sold.

Certain "shrewd" Boston capitalists have contributed $400,000 toward the purchase of an alleged bonanza in Brazil. Prof. Mills, an eminent metallurgist, while making scientific research in Dom Pedro's domains, was delighted by the discovery of gold, and investigation proved that there was no limit to the area where the color was to be found. He returned to Boston, and was not long in getting capitalists interested. A stock company was formed, and Prof. Mills was sent back with a corps of assistants and a ship load of machinery, only to discover that a huge swindle had been perpetrated by native sharpers, who had "salted" the ground.

A Woman with Presence of Mind.

Some of the insurance companies of New York have written letters of congratulation to an up-town lady on her bravery when she discovered that a room in the third story of her magnificent house was on fire. Calmly wrapping a rug about her shoulders, she entered, and, closing an open window and the doors, kept the flames from spreading, and then, telegraphing to the nearest station for aid, the flames were quickly put out, but not until every article in the room was reduced to a cinder.

A GIRL in an Iowa seminary cut all the hair from the head of her sleeping room-mate in revenge for a slight, and has been expelled by the faculty.

CURIOUS HAPPENINGS.

—A Hartford religious enthusiast undertook to fast forty days, and became a maniac at the end of the fifth day.

—A Rochester cow of playful temperament hooked her horns into the ground, turned a somersault, and broke her neck.

—A Highgate (N. H.) girl thrashed a lover who attempted to jilt her. He backed down, apologized, renewed his oath of alliance, and they are to be wedded.

—A Connecticut convict being given the customary check for $5 on his discharge from State prison, found it necessary, of course, to be identified to receive its payment, and, thinking the man he had robbed knew him best, called upon him and accomplished his purpose.

—A cat tale, told by the Sutro (Nev.) Independent: "A cat which was chased into the Sutro tunnel by a dog, the other day, turned and looked back after running about 1,500 feet into the darkness, and the light of its eyes was distinctly seen by a number of men at the mouth of the tunnel."

—Andrew Jones, of Chester, Pa., argued with Lizzie Welsh, from 6 p. m. until midnight, in a vain endeavor to convince her that it would be well to marry him. Then he committed suicide, and the girl says that if she had known he was so deeply in earnest she would have accepted him.

—A desperate fight occurred recently between the engineer and fireman of a Missouri, Kansas and Texas railway train, during the trip from Emporia to Parsons. In the struggle the throttle-valve of the engine was pulled wide open, and the speed of the train became frightful, alarming the passengers and causing them to appeal to the conductor, who lost no time in reaching the "steam end" of the flying train, where he found the engineer and the fireman belaboring each other with hammers, wrenches, etc. The speed of the train was checked just in time to avoid a collision with a freight train.

—A number of strange occurrences grouped: Josiah Walker, of Three Rivers, Mich., shot himself fatally because the town election went against the Greenback party, for which he had worked hard. One of the small seeds of a grape caused the death of a San Francisco man by lodging in the intestines and forming an abscess. Mrs. Annie Armstrong and Mrs. Mary Burns were arrested in Detroit for borrowing one another's children to order to make their families appear larger when the overseers of the poor were making the rounds. A fight between a cat, a crow, and a dog is reported from Mount Holly, N. J. A white couple were lately married in Shelby county, Tenn., by a colored divine.

—Many curious discoveries have been made in the belt that stretches from the Pacific to the Great American desert, but what follows appears to be new in the anthropology of the country: A resident of Richmond, Grant county, New Mexico, recently had occasion to dig a cellar. Just below the surface he came upon the ruins of an adobe structure, and six feet further down unearthed two skeletons, one that of a child and the other that of a full-grown person. The remarkable thing about the adult skeleton was a protuberance, larger than a hen's egg and more oblong in shape, which was fastened like a horn to the back part of the skull. On the child's skull was a similar, but smaller, growth. Both skeletons were taken from niches in a stone wall. The Grant County Herald is inclined to think that the whole pre-historic race to which the specimens belong had the protuberance, a sort of rear nose done up in bone.

—A cage in a menagerie at St. Louis contained two lions and one leopard, the lions being separated from the leopard by a partition. There was a door in the partition, through which the leopard was admitted for a few minutes each day by a lion-tamer to perform tricks with the lions. A few nights ago the keeper left the door unsecured. During the night persons about the show heard a great deal of growling and yelling, and there were noises of a scuffle in the building where the animals were confined, but such sounds are in the regular nature of things in a place of wild beasts and tame ones, and attracted no particular attention. The next morning, though, when the attendants made the rounds of the cages, there was great excitement. The cage lately containing the lions and leopard had only two occupants, and they were both lions, while the door between the compartments was open. Where the leopard had gone was a mystery until the cage was examined closely, when there appeared a good deal of blood on the floor and bars, a good deal of hair everywhere, and a heap of bones at one side. The lions had made a call on their companion in the arena, and had eaten him up.

He Let Them Talk.

It is one mark of greatness to treat small enemies with contempt. Frederick the Great never cared how much fun or criticism his people made of him. He was fond of saying that "he could do what he pleased, and his subjects could say what they pleased." How he would have treated the "seditious utterances" which Bismarck is so sternly repressing, two facts may suffice to show:

A Berlin bookseller sent to the palace a copy of the most stinging lampoon ever published against Frederick, and asked for his Majesty's instructions.

"Do not advertise it offensively," answered the King, "but sell it by all means; I hope it will pay you well."

On another occasion he found a crowd staring at a scurrilous caricature of himself, which had been pasted so high on the wall that it was not easy to see it distinctly. The King, pushing his way through the startled throng, said to his attendant:

"Put it lower down, that they may not have to strain their necks over it."

In an instant the obnoxious placard was torn to shreds, and the crowd dispersed with a shout of "Long live Father Fritz."

THE early cucumber hits below the belt.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, MAY 8, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY,
EDITORS.

Gracious! what a crowd of democrats we had in Auburn last Monday.

Dr. Luke P. Blackburn is the democratic candidate for governor of Kentucky. He was nominated by acclamation at the Louisville convention last week.

The rejoicing of the republicans is not so much on account of the veto of the army bill, as it is on account of Hayes' return to the bayonet and bloody shirt party.

Hayes' message vetoing the army appropriation bill, given in full on page 6 of this paper. Read it, and satisfy yourselves that the fraudulent president favors bayonets at the polls.

The readers of the COURIER will find another interesting communication from Hon. J. K. Edgerton, concerning the democratic nomination for president in 1880, on the first page of this paper.

In the case of Mrs. Adelaide Roberts, who shot and killed Theodore B. Weber at Chicago, May 2nd, the coroner's jury authorized that she be held for the action of the grand jury, without bail.

Reports of the city and town elections throughout the state, show decided democratic gains. Republicans may as well tumble to the racket, and get ready to throw up the sponge in 1880.

Read carefully the great speech of Hon. Daniel W. Voorhees on the third page of this paper, headed "ODIOUS ELECTION LAWS." It is the greatest effort of his life, and the subject should be well considered by every voter who favors free elections.

An effort is being made by the churches of Chicago to close the saloons on Sundays. It will require the united exertions of all the churches, ministers, courts, citizens and police officers to accomplish it; and the chances are, in that event, that they would only succeed in fastening the bolts of the front doors.

A car-load of dynamite exploded at Stratford, Ont., May 5th, killing several persons and demolishing thousands of dollars' worth of property. Two of the railroad men killed were blown into fragments, the foot of one being found 200 yards away. The wreck is said to defy description, as the entire destruction cannot yet be estimated.

Jayhawker, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, has been over to Indianapolis again, and pretends to give the plans of Hendricks and other prominent democrats, concerning the next presidential campaign. He shapes things to suit Ohio, in all his correspondence, so much so that Indiana democrats have long since placed him in the seven by nine list.

In another column we publish a list of the committees appointed to arrange for the observance of decoration day. The occasion is one which should not be overlooked by our citizens; it is right and proper that the grave of him who served his country should be decked with wreath and flower; not only those who died in the service, for those who have since died are entitled to honors as well. Let the day be observed in such a way that all can take part without being compelled to listen to abuse and political orations, so common on such occasions.

At a meeting of the county Board of Education, held at the office of the county superintendent in Waterloo last week, the board decided to re-adopt Harvey's grammars for six years. Harper's geographies were adopted instead of Monteith's, also for six years, this change will be a saving to the parents, as there are five books in the old series, while there are but two in the new. The change does not affect incorporated towns. All other school books were adopted last fall, so that there will be no more changes for six years.

The new democratic officers of the town of Auburn, will please bear in mind that the people expect an economical administration of town affairs during the coming year. It is expected that no public money will be wasted in experiments; rid the town of debt as fast as possible, when out of debt, or nearly so, then the first thing in order should be the protection of property against fire. When that time arrives we shall boldly advocate the organization of a first-class department, with apparatus that will be effective in time of an emergency.

The democrats of Auburn met pursuant to call, at the town council room, on last Saturday evening and placed in nomination the excellent ticket which was elected on Monday. Mr. Wm. McIntyre was chairman of the meeting, Mr. W. H. Dills, secretary, and F. E. Davenport and Theo. Reed tellers. Upon motion Messrs. F. E. Davenport, T. D Gross and Theo. Reed were appointed town committeemen for the ensuing year. Harmony and good feeling prevailed throughout the entire meeting, which was said to be the largest convention ever held in Auburn to nominate candidates for town offices.

Robert L. Green, deputy-clerk of the circuit court at Covington, Ky., jumped from the suspension bridge, a distance of ninety-five feet, Monday afternoon, but was rescued by the heroic efforts of a fifteen-year-old boy named John Shannan, who jumped in after him. Green was in a fit of temporary insanity, superinduced by drinking, and he is still alive.

The latest sensation is the elopement of Sheriff Conklin's daughter, of Portage, Wis., a good looking young lady of seventeen, with a prisoner in the jail who was confined for burglary. Woods, the prisoner, was released by her and they fled together, but were overtaken and returned after an exciting chase. This affair carries off the palm, and that aristocratic young lady who gave herself to her father's coachman must yield the medal to Miss Conklin. Next.

The semi-annual settlement with the county treasurer has just been made, for taxes collected on the first installment for 1878. The amount due each of the several funds of the state, county and township, is as follows:

State Tax	5,859 88
New State-house Tax	823 85
Common School Fund	7,655 86
County Fund	16,982 71
Township Fund	4,257 77
Tuition Fund	459 21
Special School Fund	10,699 27
Dog Fund	748 46
Road Fund	9,559 84
Additional Special School	1,830 14
Interest on County Bonds	8,002 06
Total	$62,478 50

The State Sentinel says: "The new double postal card, which has been authorized by the government, promises to prove very convenient and advantageous. It will be of the same size of the one now in use, worth just double as much, with a stamp on each upper corner. The stamp on the upper right hand corner wil be canceled when the card is sent for the first time, and the other when it is returned. When it first goes the writer puts his communication on the back and the address of his correspondent on the face. The receiver answers on the same card, erases his name and writes that of the person who sent it to him. The original sender must be careful not to use all of the space on the card. The advantages are economy and convenience, and then, too, as evidence in legal proceedings there is sometimes an advantage in having a communication and its answer together on the same card or paper."

The joint caucus committee of democrats, to which is delegated the management of the political situation in congress, held a long session a few days since. After discussing the question in all its phases, it was decided to put through congress a bill for the repeal of the troops at the polls clause of the statutes, as an independent measure. A bill of this character was introduced in the house on Monday last, of which the following is the text:

Whereas, The presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people, and tends to destroy the freedom of elections, therefore be it enacted, etc., that it shall not be lawful to bring to, or employ at any place, where a general or special election is being held in a state, any part of the army, or navy, of the United States, or to enforce section four, article four, of the constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, on the application of a legislature or the executive of the state where such force is to be used, and so much of all laws as is inconsistent therewith is hereby repealed.

An effort will be made to pass the bill under the suspension of the rules; if this can not be done, it will be referred to the appropriate committee, and be reported back for action within a day or two. It is yet to be decided whether there will be any debate allowed. The object is to pass the bill through both houses before the legislative bill is considered by the senate. The independent repeal bill is worded in such a way as to make it exceedingly difficult for Mr. Hayes to give a reason for his veto. It plainly states that so much of the statutes as permit the use of troops at the polls on an election day is hereby repealed. This will take from the president the excuse that the repeal curtails the powers of civil officers in their regular duties on the day of election.

—The social event of the week took place at the Swineford House, on Tuesday evening. A number of invited guests assembled in the parlor of the hotel, and after the usual greetings, some of the party engaged in social games, while others tripped the "light fantastic toe" in the dining-hall, which had been cleared for the occasion. In the midst of the enjoyment "mine host" appeared upon the scene and ordered his guests from "labor to refreshment." The command was promptly obeyed, and all were seated at tables and served with delicious ice-cream, cake, lemonade, &c., of the choicest variety. The party consisted of Mr. and Mrs. J. Abright, Mr. and Mrs. D. D. Snyder, Dr. and Mrs. Spooner, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Austin, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Leas, Mr. and Mrs. John Robbins, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Davis, Mrs. Mattie C. Birdsell, Miss Frankie Ryan, Mrs. A. J Ralston, Mrs. Dills, Miss Frankie Stahl, Mrs. Forkner, Miss Sadie Earlston, Mr. G. H. Yesbera, Mr. D. H. Hampton, Mr. and Mrs. Swineford and the writer and wife. All agreed that Mr. and Mrs. Swineford know how to entertain their friends, as well as they know how to keep a first-class hotel.

A Complaint Against Tilden.

[New York Express.]

Mr. Tilden is so busy with his presidential schemes that he has not had time to express an opinion on the army appropriation bill and the democratic fight for a free ballot. Mr. Hendricks has spoken out in no doubtful terms as becomes a statesman who loves his party for its principles much more than for its offices. In fact, every leading democrat in the Union has expressed an opinion, and cheered on the representatives of the people who are fighting the great popular battle on the floors of congress, save and except Hon. Samuel J. Tilden. It was complained of Mr. Tilden that he gave no sign in 1876 when the destinies of the country hung trembling in the balance. The true leaders of the democracy in Washington have, therefore, expected no word of encouragement from him at this time, when the battle for the constitution and the purity of the ballot-box is being waged with a patriotism and ability which stir the hearts of all lovers of their country to their profoundest depths. Mr. Tilden is too busy in his little raid on democratic officials in this city to think about the battle of the democracy against republican tyranny. Next year, when the battle is won, he will send out editorials to inform the country editors how deeply he is rejoiced at the overthrow of the bayonet and the United States marshal.

Principles to the Front.

Some days since Senator Blaine informed the senate, and the country, that very few soldiers are in the states east of the Mississippi river, or in any of the other states, and argued, therefore, that all this talk about troops at the polls was nonsensical, simply because they could not be brought from the frontier to do military duty at the polls. The principle of the thing was ignored; the great contemplated wrong was obscured by a miserable subterfuge; a falsehood was perpetrated in the interest of despotism, and the republican party. It was the plea of a demagogue of the most dangerous type in favor of military supremacy over the civil authorities; and what of this is true of Blaine is true of every republican conspirator and of every conspirator's organ throughout the country. The democratic party, appreciating the situation, proposes to resist in its incipiency the infamous scheme of the republican party. Daniel Webster, many years since, comprehended the value of prompt action when the liberties of the people were in danger, and with the wealth of his logic and eloquence, placed a proper estimate upon adhering to principle when he said;

Every encroachment, great or small, is important enough to awaken the attention of those who are entrusted with the preservation of a constitutional government. We are not to wait till great public mischiefs come, till the government is overthrown, or liberty itself put into extreme jeopardy. We should not be worthy sons of our fathers were we so to regard great questions affecting the general freedom. Those fathers accomplished the revolution on a strict question of principle. The parliament of Great Britain asserted a right to tax the colonies in all cases whatsoever; and it was precisely on this question that they made the revolution turn. The amount of taxation was trifling, but the claim itself was inconsistent with liberty, and that was in their eyes enough. It was against the recital of an act of parliament, rather than against any suffering under its enactments, that they took up arms. They went to war against a preamble. They fought seven years against a declaration. They poured out their treasures and blood like water, in a contest against an assertion which those less sagacious, and not so well schooled in the principles of civil liberty, would have regarded as barren phraseology or mere parade of words. They saw in the claim of the British parliament a seminal principle of mischief, the germ of unjust power; they detected it, dragged it forth from underneath its plausible disguises, struck at it, nor did it elude either their steady eye or well directed blow, till they had extirpated and destroyed it to the smallest fiber. On this question of principle, while actual suffering was yet afar off, they raise their flag against a power to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome, in the height of her glory, is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England. The necessity of holding strictly to the principle upon which free governments are constructed, and to those precise lines which fix the partitions of power between different branches, is as plain, if not as cogent, as that of resisting, as our fathers did, the strides of the parent country, against the rights of the colonies; because, whether the power which exceeds its just limits be foreign or domestic, whether it be the encroachment of all branches on the rights of the people, or that of one branch on the rights of others, in either case the balanced and well adjusted machinery of free government is disturbed, and, if the derangement go on, the whole system must fall.

The democratic party stands forth proclaiming the great truth to the country that troops at the polls are dangerous to the liberties of the people. The principle is right and must triumph. If the right to place troops at the polls is conceded, the republic is gone. The democratic party will not recede. To back down would be treason. Let Hayes stand by his veto, and let the democratic party stand by its patriotic declaration, "No troops at the polls!" and rather than take a backward step, let the army perish, if Hayes so ordains.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

The most exquisite pleasure is derived from Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes, His Alista Bouquet, Sweet Clover, Ladies' Favorite, and other handkerchief odors, are as fragrant and natural as the flowers from which they are made. They are truly delightful.

THE CREDULOUS NORTH.

Something About That Thousand Dollar Confederate Bond.

[Boise City Idahoan.]

There is a dispatch going the rounds of the radical press of the country stating that T. W. Phillips, of North Carolina, has sent a confederate bond for $1,000, asking Secretary Sherman to place it on file, stating that he (Phillips) is satisfied that the southern scrip will all be paid now as the democrats are in power, and he is anxious to have his on file first. Now this sounds very innocent, and looks like this Phillips was one of those imaginary insane ones who are said to believe that there is a scheme to be carried out by the democratic party to secure the payment of those southern bonds, and of course this dispatch is sent out to help convey this idea, and will be copied by every narrow-minded round-head in the country. But as it happens there is a man right here in Boise City, who is well known as a man of veracity, who says he has known T. W. Phillips, of North Carolina, for thirty years, and knows him to be a radical republican carpet-bagger, who held positions under the carpet-bag rule, and of course he sends this bond and letter to serve the diabolical ends of his equally corrupt party co-workers in the north, who are very anxious to stir up the old sectional jealousy of the north, in the hope of regaining the power which official corruption and oppressive legislation have caused them to lose. When a political party is so corrupt and weak that it requires constant stimulants to keep it alive; when, instead of feeding on wholesome truths and statesmanlike doctrines, it depends for its strength on raising the most debasing passions of the human heart, and depends upon falsehood to accomplish its ends, the sooner it dies and is buried beyond the reach of sight or scent the sooner our country will see peace and prosperity abroad in the land, and the laborer receive the full reward of his exertions.

CORPORATION ELECTION.

Entire Democratic Ticket Elected.

The town election on last Monday was quiet and orderly. The republicans worked energetically in the forepart of the day for the success of their whole ticket, but finally concentrated their forces upon their candidate for treasurer, notwithstanding which, the democratic candidate was elected by a handsome majority. The following shows the number of votes cast for each candidate, and the democratic majority for each office.

FIRST DISTRICT.
James Anderson (dem.)	183
Joseph E. Shilling (rep.)	112

TUTT'S PILLS

INDORSED BY PHYSICIANS, CLERGYMEN, AND THE AFFLICTED EVERYWHERE.

THE GREATEST MEDICAL TRIUMPH OF THE AGE.

TUTT'S PILLS CURE SICK HEADACHE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE DYSPEPSIA.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE CONSTIPATION.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE PILES.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE FEVER AND AGUE.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE BILIOUS COLIC.
TUTT'S PILLS Cure KIDNEY Complaint.
TUTT'S PILLS CURE TORPID LIVER.
TUTT'S PILLS IMPART APPETITE.

DR. TUTT has succeeded in combining in these pills the heretofore antagonistic qualities of a STRENGTHENING PURGATIVE, and a PURIFYING TONIC.

Their first apparent effect is to increase the appetite by causing the food to properly assimilate. Thus the system is nourished, and by their tonic action on the digestive organs, regular and healthy evacuations are produced.

The rapidity with which PERSONS TAKE ON FLESH while under the influence of these Pills, indicates their adaptability to nourish the body, hence their efficacy in curing nervous debility, melancholy, dyspepsia, wasting of the muscles, sluggishness of the liver, chronic constipation, and imparting health and strength to the system. Sold everywhere.

Price 25 cents.

AMITIE.

Newville.

—Cool and damp.

—Wheat growing finely; has the appearance of a good crop.

—Farmers engaged in putting in oats and preparing ground for corn and potatoes.

—The United Brethren held quarterly meeting, last Saturday and Sunday, at their church over the river.

—Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, there was a good turnout to hear the reading at the hall Saturday evening.

—Our merchants are now filling up their stores with new goods, preparatory to the summer trade; all that remains to be done is to advertise them in the COURIER, so that people will know what they have.

—A neat new fence is being built around the school grounds, a much-needed improvement.

—The Newville items were omitted last week, owing to the illness of the undersigned.

Local and Miscellaneous

—Fill up the vacant store-rooms.

—The street-sprinkler is booming.

—New roof on the Methodist church.

—Three deaths in Auburn this week.

—Judge Best, of Waterloo, was in town last Friday.

—Frank Copper, girls, was only twenty six last Tuesday.

—Sun's raise had no warmth during a portion of this week.

—The Buckeye clothes-wringer can be bought at Davis' for $4.00.

—The moon is on a prolonged spree these nights—full as a tick.

—It is better to hang around a dozen girls than one street-corner.

—Trees begin to die at their tops. Men begin to dye there, too.

—Highest prices paid for butter and eggs at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.

—Clerks all busy this week—holding down goods boxes and whittling.

—Rev. Young took his departure for the old country, last Monday morning.

—Numerous improvements are contemplated in the building line this summer.

—Millinery goods at actual cost after this week, at the store of H. H. Stamets.

—Isaac Hague has a new boot. He wears it on a post in front of his new shoe-store.

—One of the most approved methods for raising corn is to take hold of the stalks and pull.

—Mill men will take notice that they can buy engine oil at Davis', at manufacturers' prices.

—Did you ever hear a bed-tick?—Beres Advertiser. No, but we have felt a seed-tick.

—Buy your new spring "duds" where you are sure of getting a good fit. Yesbera's is the place.

—Young man, if you want a nobby spring or summer hat, go to Yesbera's and buy it. He has the latest.

—One uproarious drunk landed in the cooler Tuesday night. Fine: Ten nights in a barroom with a muzzle on.

—R. Elson left for the Buckeye state last Saturday, where he will attend the golden wedding of his parents.

—Schaab, Beugnot & Co. sell the best and freshest groceries that can be had, and at prices low as the lowest.

—Any person wanting a large plug hat, made of tin, for a sign, should leave his order with B. Goodman.

—Schaab, Beugnot & Co. will sell you a better carpet for less money than any other store in northern Indiana.

—The most durable boot-sign, is one made of heavy tin. Call at B. Goodman's and have one made to order.

—Davis has the best stock of wagon and carriage makers' hardware in the county, and sells at uniform low prices.

—All the new and fancy styles of piece goods, now in stock at Yesbera's. Leave your order soon and avoid the rush.

—Reliable statistics show that Indians never kiss each other. Having seen a few Indians, we don't blame them.

—For parasols go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., they have just received a large stock of them at prices lower than the lowest.

—Holman's fever and ague pad still has the lead in this market. The genuine article is kept on sale at Hoyt's drug-store.

—No need to tell a young lady when her eyes are bewitchingly beautiful; in most cases she is wonderfully cogn-eyes-ant of it.

—You can find the best brands of white lead, rubber and other mixed paints at Davis' a little cheaper than anywhere else.

—Just because a man is spider-legged can he be arrested for a vagrant, on the ground that he has "no visible means of support?"

—Pete—our Pete, the dashing junior in the COURIER composing room—has got a moustache. He's going to make a "mash" at first sight.

—Druggist's wanting a large mortar made, for a sign, will do well to call on B. Goodman. He makes them of heavy tin, and does neat work.

—A rumor is afloat in Valparaiso that Bro. Zimmerman, of the Messenger, is about to poke his head into the matrimonial halter—tie up, as it were. Can these things be?

—If you want a nice fine dress hat, either in fur or straw, go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., as they have the largest stock to select from, and sell at prices below competition.

—H. H. Stamets has a first-class milliner, and guarantees every article to give satisfaction. All goods in his line will be sold at cost in order to clear out his stock, to quit business.

—A competent workman, familiar with the construction of telephones, can secure a job at Penfield & Emanuel's law office, as connection between that building and Stamets' millinery store is wanted at once.

—5,000 yards of brown shirtings now in stock at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., all bought before the advance, and now being sold at the old prices. Do not miss this opportunity to get a bargain.

—The rush continues at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. Everybody seems anxious to secure dry-goods and clothing at big bargains.

—"What is home without a baby?" Ask J. J. VanAuken and he'll explain it all. It weighed 12¼ pounds and claimed its female apparel last Thursday. Good enough, J. J.—you're a good'un.

—"Seeing is believing." If you don't think the COURIER office is prepared to do the nicest kind of job printing, send in some; we will convince you to the contrary.

—Uncle Tom Gross carries his surplus silver coins in a shot-bag, and says he finds but one difficulty in filling it—too much of it leaks out through the hole in the top.

—Lost, on last Saturday, between Garrett and Auburn junction, a package of type. The finder will please send the package to the COURIER office and oblige the owner.

—Amateur prize-fight down on the corner Tuesday evening. The atmosphere was heavy with bricks and cuss-words, and there was weepin' and whalin' and snatchin' of teeth.

—They were having a snarl, and she asked him if there was anything in the past he would recall, to which the heartless wretch made this answer: "Yes—the day you first refused me."

—A girl named Cherry, daughter of a farmer in Shelby county, is about to increase the Cherry crop on her father's farm, the result of placing too implicit confidence in a masculine friend.

—Our genial host on the corner, Sherman Hollister, who dishes up choice viands to the famished traveler, and does it in city style, visited Fort Wayne yesterday. Time, 7 hours and 30 minutes.

—Rev. Johnson will be absent for the next three or four weeks. He goes as a delegate from the Fort Wayne Presbytery, to attend the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, which meets at Saratoga, N. Y.

—If r-e-d-d-i-s-h doesn't spell radish, we don't know what it does spell; at the same time, however, we would mildly suggest to the Napoleon (O.) Northwest that it should adopt the latter orthography. It looks much nicer.

—It is very easy to account for the large sales of Schaab, Beugnot & Co. when you visit their store and see the piles of goods on their counters and shelves. They buy in large quantities and get the benefit of bottom prices.

—Don't denounce the celebrated Holman liver pad until you have given it a fair trial. This remedy never fails to cure the disease for which it is recommended, if you give a fair trial. Buy one of C. H. Hoyt, sole agent for Auburn.

—Our young folks are losing a vast amount of solid fun in not using up these cold nights, occasionally, in the "mazy." It will soon be past the time to enjoy it, for the "conspiration" will flow freely without the aid of any foot-shaking.

—"Penelope, or the Milkman's Bride," is the last comic opera. The Madrigal club, of Fort Wayne, will give it at Columbia City to-morrow night. The next one will probably be "The tattered Shirt-tail, or the Washwoman's Revenge."

—Did you know that Yesbera has just added a full line of gent's furnishing goods? He can supply you with anything you want in the way of linen shirts, collars and cuffs, necties, half-hose, handkerchiefs &c. &c. All sold at bottom prices.

—The other evening a lady of Falls county was sitting on the hearth, with her child on her lap, when it gave away, precipitating both into the fire.—Ex. What gave away?—her lap or the child? That's evidently a "give away" on somebody.

—We sell one or a dozen at wholesale prices.

The above can be had at Kiblinger & Co.'s Hardware-store, Auburn, Ind.

—A man who can ride on a railway train one whole night, sit up to his girl the next two, ride again on the following night, and get his full work in at business next day, must be blessed with a remarkably robust constitution; yet we heard of just such a case, a few days ago.

—There are three periods during the day when a man can display his nature to a good advantage, or can beautifully exhibit the amount of hog he contains to the square inch, and those times are when he is satisfying nature's demands at the breakfast, dinner and supper table.

—While on a transient visit to Valparaiso, last week, we attended an amateur rehearsal of "Pinafore," which has not yet been presented in that flourishing suburb of Chicago. Valpo. has good home talent, dramatically and vocally, and the opera will doubtless be a success.

—In order to prevent any mistakes which might occur, we have been requested to state that it is not S. U Turney who has associated with J. Beugnot in the fruit-tree business, but A. Turney, and the firm name is Turney & Beugnot. The similarity of names prompts this particular notice, as it might possibly occasion some misunderstanding.

—A Wabash business house is infested with ghosts, if we may rely on the statements of last week's Courier, which dishes up a first-class spook yarn. We'll believe it this one time, but don't try to work on our credulity any further, namesake.

—List of unclaimed letters remaining in the postoffice at Auburn, Indiana, for the week ending May 8, 1879: S. W. David, John Dannels, Cathrina Greiger, James Luney, Geo. Moore, Richard Simpson (2), Ann R. Smith.

JOS. RAINIER, P. M.

—S. B. Lonsway, a brakeman on the B. & O. road, sustained a painful injury at the junction, Thursday night of last week, by which he lost the thumb and forefinger of his right hand, while coupling cars. The lacerated hand was dressed by Dr. Spooner, and is healing as rapidly as could be expected.

—The cold weather of the fore part of this week may be surprising to some people, but it isn't to us. Having shed our winter under-clothes last week—and not having access to our neighbors' clothes-lines—we have daily expected to see the mercury sink down a mile and a quarter below Cairo.

—Strange as it may appear, two of our young fellows had a racket about a girl last week. One is a tailor and the other an employe in the stave-factory, and report says that the manipulator of the shears came out on top of the pile. During the fracas the girl was badly wounded—in the heart.

—Mrs. Mattie C. Birdsell, who has been visiting with the family of the "boss" of the boot up-side down, leaves to-day for her home near Richmond this state. The many friends of Mrs. B. in this place and Waterloo, regret that she cannot remain with us longer, but hope to see her soon again.

—On next Monday morning H. H. Stamets will commence closing out his entire stock of millinery goods, fancy goods, dry goods, notions, gent's furnishing goods, men's and youths' hats and caps at actual cost. He means business. Get what you want while there is a variety to choose from.

—Mrs. Thos. B. Baldock, who has been ill for the past three weeks, was summoned by the Angel of Death, yesterday morning, and her soul passed into eternity at 3 o'clock, death being caused by disease of the heart and lungs. Services will be preached at the Baptist church to-morrow, May 9, at 2 o'clock p. m.

—He tried to get out unobserved, but luck wasn't on his side. He closed the saloon door and stepped out on the sidewalk, wiping his moustache the while, just in time to confront his lady love face to face. Try the back door next time, old man, if you would fain imbibe on the sly, for there cruel fate cannot thwart you.

—Correspondents of the COURIER will please bear in mind that we insert local notices at five cents a line, and that all advertisements or "puffs" sent in with their news items will be eliminated therefrom. While we are fully appreciative of any and all interesting matter, briefly written, we can hardly use the free advertisements.

—Parents should keep a watchful eye over their little girls who are seized with the rope-jumping mania. Cases of death from over exertion in this sport are numerous, and we now hear of a case at Knightstown, where a girl named Ella Applegate injured herself internally and died, the result of her effort to excel in jumping a rope.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. —Remark of severe parent to blooming daughter, upon discovering that one of the legs of the big chair in the parlor had been broken the Sunday evening previous: "I wish you to understand, Susan, that this chair was constructed with a view to the accommodation of one person at a time, and has not the strength and scarcely the capacity for two."

—Died, Tuesday night, May 6, at the home of her parents in this place, Eliza Tess, in the seventeenth year of her age. She was sick but a few days, having been up until last Saturday, since which time she has been confined to her bed, suffering with inflammatory rheumatism. The funeral service will take place this (Thursday) afternoon, at the Presbyterian church, at 2 o'clock.

—It is reported that Jos. Ebright, of Defiance, was murdered at the depot in that place Monday night. He had started on a visit to Fort Wayne, having about $75 on his person, but his coat, hat and pocket-book were found next morning not far from the depot and near the Maumee river. Evidences of foul play are convincing, though we trust it may not be so serious as represented.

—The center of attraction last Monday was the court-room of 'Squire Walbora, at which place the bastardy case of Susan Wallace vs. Jno. E. Miller, was in progress. It drew a larger mob than a circus would, and the election crowd around the polls couldn't compare with it. The case, we are informed, has been appealed to the circuit court, where the parties who have heard it once can get a second benefit.

—Our townsman, W. H. McQuiston, had a narrow escape from being a candidate for city clerk at Ft. Wayne, owing to a typographical error in last Saturday's Daily News. This correction appeared in the News on Monday evening:

"W. H. McQuiston, whose name was erroneously printed in the News of Saturday as a candidate for city clerk, is at Auburn attending to his business of selling dry goods. It should have read Wilson McQuiston, who is a resident in this city."

—We would respectfully announce to our gentlemen visitors that our sanctum is furnished with spittoons large enough to accommodate any ordinary mouthful of tobacco-juice, and as there is now no stove convenient to spit on, would earnestly solicit the use of the above-mentioned receptacles. We don't care so much whether you hit them or not at every shot, if you'll only make the effort and spit at 'em. A small boy will be in attendance, at all times, to push the spittoons around where you want them.

—W. W. Hoffman, operator at the B. & O. depot, doesn't care for any more blue vitrol in his'n. Last Monday he used an old steel pen in picking some sore spots on his tongue, the result of an ague siege, and the sores became painful beyond endurance; to alleviate this he experimented with a lump of blue vitrol, and the consequences may be imagined; his tongue swelled so that he couldn't shut his mouth, to say nothing of speaking, and he suffered intense agony. Dr. Spooner attended him, and he is now slowly improving.

—A man must necessarily feel the enormous responsibilities resting upon him when he gets to be, first, a husband and father—to say nothing of having held the offices of son, grand-son, brother, cousin, nephew and lover, simultaneously; then comes his apprenticeship as a son-in-law, brother-in-law and general-step-stranger-in-law to everybody; but all, all these self-imposed relationships and afflictions are but "shadowy phantoms, light as air," as compared with those of the woman who assumes the scathing position of the much-wronged mother-in-law.

—We read of a rather "circular singumstance" which occurred near Wabash, a few days since, in which a woman named Voteur gave birth to a still-born child whose skull had been fractured and one leg and an arm broken in a severe fall received by the mother a few hours previous to the delivery; but the strangest part follows. Shortly after the first confinement, Mrs. V. gave birth to another Vote(u)r, who is reported alive and healthy, all the injury having been imposed on its unfortunate room-mate. This child ought to congratulate itself on being alive.

—A traveling swindler, operating an envelope lottery outfit, came to grief on the square yesterday afternoon. He managed to take in two or three ignoramuses who innocently(?) nibbled at the bait he offered, when they squealed most beautifully at getting left. The sharper was requested to drop $8 for the state's benefit and $5 for the prosecutor, which, after some hustling, he accordingly did. The other gang, who were not fortunate enough to win his money but were equally guilty, were let off without punishment. This is equity.

—The Wabash Courier tells of the fleecing of an unsophisticated rural youth, in a pool room at that place, by three pool sharks of said city. They—i. e. the p. s.—got their work in on the country boy for about ten dollars' worth, having put up a job on him by "playing off." Young men from the country, however, are not the only ones who find "soft snaps" of that kind, as most any stranger is liable to get picked up in a similar style by professional hangers-on in pool and billiard rooms; that's the way they have of "getting on in the world" and keeping their insides lubricated.

—A Defiance man took a tumble from a Wabash passenger train, several days since, in the following ungraceful manner:

Last Friday afternoon while James Tennyson of this city was coming east from Fort Wayne on the Wabash road he stepped back on the rear platform and losing his balance fell off. He grasped the railing, but the train was running at the rate of about twenty miles an hour, and he couldn't maintain his hold. The fall stunned him considerably and injured his left leg but he sustained no broken bones. He lay upon the track some time, and was finally picked up by a passing farmer who cared for him until evening when he was sent to this city. He is still confined to his room but expects to be out in a few days.—Defiance Democrat.

The surest way to avoid falling off the rear platform is to lock the back door and sit in the middle of the car.

—That missing horse, belonging to the Saginaw railroad company, mention of which was made in the COURIER of last week, has turned up. We learn from a reliable source that a good-natured baggage-smasher in the employ of said company,—the initial-letter of whose first name is Dan Hickey,—came down to see his heart's choice that day and conceived the happy idea of taking her out riding. He accordingly stole with cat-like tread into the aforesaid company's stable, in the still hours of the night in question, and willfully appropriated the said horse to his own use, contrary to the established rules in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the stable. O Dan! The horse was found a few days afterward, tied to a halter-strap in Corunna, Dan, having forgotten, in his blind infatuation, where the steed belonged. You Daniel! No arrests.

A Card.

TO THE PUBLIC:—Having canvassed this county last winter and been quite successful, I have concluded to make another trip over it, also Steuben county, for the purpose of soliciting further orders, having recently formed a partnership with J. Beugnot of this place. We are prepared to take orders for trees, shrubs and vines of all varieties and descriptions, and can confidently state that satisfaction will be given on day of delivery. Mr. Beugnot and myself will give our whole time and attention to this business, and our aim shall be to please every one from whom we may be favored with an order. Now is the time to make your orders, while everything in the nursery line is down to hard-pan prices. A. TURNEY.

SPRING.

When spring is here,
And hawthorn boughs are white with bloom of May
And singing birds make happy music near,
Oh, then a thousand hearts keep holiday.

Life is more sweet;
Youth revels in it with an added zest,
Slow pulse of age warms to a quicker beat,
And grief sits lighter in the mourner's breast.

For lo! the rain
Is over, and the night is past and gone;
Joy, with the radiant morning, comes again,
And those bright hours are as the gracious dawn.

Thank God for spring!
Hope's dear and tender throng its pleasant days,
Now that all nature is awakening,
Wake, too, my soul, in strains of grateful praise.

DR. THORNE'S PRESCRIPTION.

"There is one thing I never will do, and that is, marry a widower," said Laura, with more energy than she had displayed before in a week, the idle white fingers meanwhile beating a quick tattoo on the pane covered with drops, and her head, with its bright-bronze hair, nodding so emphatically that the ivy-leaves above her were all in a tremble.

"Nor a doctor," said Aunt Prudence, shrewdly, as she glanced out of her window in time to see Dr. Thorne's buggy, well spattered with country mud, go around the corner, and the stately doctor, under his umbrella, in the act of replacing his hat on his head. "I knew a girl once—"

"Oh, spare me, Aunt Prue! I know all about it; she married just as she had vowed she would not. It does not follow that I am to be so foolish, does it? I had rather be a blessed old maid, like you, if I could only be half as good, than to be Mrs. Somebody number two."

"How is it about doctors?"

"They are my especial abomination. They smell of drugs, and are given to lecturing people," said Laura, her color deepening under the spinster's keen gaze, and her fingers beating a quicker measure.

"It seems odd that you have taken such a dislike to Dr. Thorne, Laura; everybody else likes him," said that young lady's mother from her seat by the fire, where her fingers were busy doing her darling's mending, while her thoughts were planning how she might in some other way take every shadow of care from her young life.

"I did not mention his name in particular, mother."

"Well, I knew you meant him, for you have not liked him since I called him in to prescribe for your headaches. By the way, you never showed me his last prescription; I noticed it was quite lengthy."

"Oh, it was some nonsense about exercise and early hours—quite a little lecture, in fact, for which he received no thanks," said Laura, evasively.

Then the conversation was changed by Mrs. Lamont consulting her sister about the pudding for dinner, while Laura's thoughts ran on in this heedless fashion:

"The impudence of the man! All those fine words meant simply this: 'You are a lazy, good-for-nothing girl; go to work, and you will be better.' Not that I think I am anything else, but one does not care to be reminded of such things. I wonder if he knows that this dear little mother of mine has made it the one object of her life to anticipate all my wishes, and make me the ignorant butterfly of fashion that I am? And Aunt Prue is in league with her. Dear souls! they want to make me happy. How disappointed they would be if they knew how restless and miserable I am! To work in this house is impossible; and yet I would like to be of use to some one. I don't believe I am naturally lazy, or this kind of a life would suit me. I suppose he thinks Agnes Bell a paragon. She knows all about housekeeping, and visits the poor. Everybody says she would make him a splendid wife. Well, I hope she likes widowers; I don't."

Here the soliloquy was ended by Laura turning to the piano and dashing off the most brilliant thing she knew—anything to draw her thoughts. Presently the notes grew softer, and she heard Aunt Prue say:

"There is our new neighbor out at the gate, and such a careless-looking creature! How can people be so thoughtless about their appearance?" glancing over her own spotless attire.

"Perhaps there is some excuse for her, Prue," said the other sister, who always found a cloak for everyone's shortcomings. "Katie says she has three little children, and does her own work. A sick baby, too, who cries half the night. You know Katie's room is on that side of the house. She says she often sees the little woman walking the floor late at night, with the baby in her arms."

"All habit, this walking the floor with children," said Aunt Prudence, who would have every child brought up by rule, as far as sleeping and eating were concerned.

"Why haven't you been to see her?" inquired Laura, wheeling suddenly around on her piano-stool.

"She has her hands full without seeing strangers," answered her mother.

Then the sisters' conversation drifted away upon other topics, while Laura fell into a brown study that lasted about ten minutes, when she suddenly rose, and, taking her waterproof from a closet, said, abruptly:

"I am going over there."

"Where?" echoed mother and aunt, having forgotten their previous conversation.

"Our next-door neighbor's."

"Are you crazy, child? It is morning, and she will not have her work done," said her mother.

"Your hair is in crimp-pins," called Aunt Prue, for the willful girl had by this time reached the gate.

The door-bell next door was broken, so Laura rapped; but there was such a commotion in the hall that she could not be heard, so she opened the door and walked in. A boy of 5 was in the act of sliding down the balusters, which feat he accomplished with such rapidity that the astonished visitor held her breath till she saw that he landed safely. A little girl with tangled curls and a very dirty apron was shouting and clapping her hands as audience.

"We're playing circus. Mamma is in the sitting-room," they replied, in answer to Laura's questions.

The door was opened, as Laura tapped, by a pale, tired-looking woman, with a baby in her arms just freshly dressed, but so fretful that nothing but constant tossing up and down would keep him quiet. There were traces of tears on the mother's face, and the room was in disorder. She evidently was much surprised at her visitor, but Laura's easy manner reassured her.

"I am Laura Lamont—your neighbor. I only heard this morning that your baby was sick, and came over to rest you a little while; I am sure your arms must ache."

And without waiting for a reply she took the baby, who was so surprised to see the lovely face bending over him that he forgot to cry.

"He is not sick," said the mother, trying hard to keep back the tears; "he has fretted like that since he was born. I feel sometimes as if I could not bear it any longer. I was awake half the night with him, and now it is nearly time to get dinner, and my breakfast-table not cleared, nor a bit of work done. I believe he tries to keep awake."

"Why don't you try letting him cry?"

"I have to, sometimes; but he cries so hard I am afraid he will have a spasm."

"Well, trust him with me a little while;" and Laura began walking up and down the room, singing a low lullaby, while the little woman picked up the playthings, brushed the hearth, and made the room look more cheerful; then she went over to her breakfast-table.

A half-hour's singing and walking before the little one was ready for his cradle; then Laura nodded good-by to her neighbor, who was busily preparing dinner, and got in return such a look of heartfelt thanks that she went home with a new feeling in her heart.

"It was such a little thing to do, and yet I have made somebody happier. I have been of some use. Poor thing, I should think she would be utterly discouraged."

And forthwith there was a slight change in the resolution she had formed that morning. It now read, "I will never marry a widower, a doctor, or a poor man." Then she laughed softly to herself, as she thought what Aunt Prue would say.

The next morning the sun shone, and Laura, to everybody's astonishment, appeared at the breakfast-table and announced her intention of surprising her lazy pony by going for a drive. Everybody else was busy, so she started alone. But just as she was gathering up the reins a wistful little face peered through the fence in the next yard.

"I say, you've got a jolly pony."

"Would you like to go with me, Charlie?"

"My name is Tommy Blake. I'll bet I'd like to go; and Susie, too."

"Well, run and ask mamma."

In a few minutes the happy little ones were in beside her—Susie clinging timidly to her skirts, while Tommy stood boldly up in front, whip in hand, ready to stir up the pony.

"It will be such a rest for me; they are so full of mischief," said Mrs. Blake, as she put them in; and again the thankful look went down into Laura's heart, and made the morning a very happy one.

It was one of those early spring days when everything seemed delightful after the long, cold winter. The pony felt lively, and so did the children. Tommy, in particular, was inclined to be rather more communicative about home matters than Laura desired.

"Papa is cross sometimes when dinner isn't ready, and says bad words; then mamma cries. Dinner was ready yesterday, though, 'cause you helped."

"Who is coming, Tommy?" said Laura, anxious to change the subject.

"Hello—that's the doctor! I know him. He sewed up my head when I fell down stairs;" and he waved his hat at that gentleman, who was looking with surprise at the phaeton and its occupants.

Laura fancied his bow was a trifle less cool than usual, and thought, angrily, "I'll never take them again. He thinks I am following his advice, and I won't gratify him."

He thought, "There is more to that girl than I supposed. I really wish she would cultivate Mrs. Blake; the little woman sadly needs a helping hand." Then he straightway banished the beautiful Miss Lamont from his mind, and commenced planning his new treatise on diphtheria.

The lovely spring days followed each other in rapid succession, and every day Laura's pony carried its happy load out into country roads where the air was the purest. Sometimes the little mother and the baby went, and it was surprising to see what a change came over them all. The rich color came into Laura's cheeks, and she no longer complained of headache or blues.

Cheerful companionship and a little leisure made Mrs. Blake bright-eyed and interesting, while Aunt Prue found some old-fashioned remedy for colic that made the baby sleep at nights, and Laura helped her in many little ways that gave her time to rest and improve herself.

The quiet parties before Easter, where Laura frequently met Dr. Thorne, gave place to those of a livelier tendency that he seldom frequented; for, although a social man, he had reached that age when dancing and flirtation had lost their charm.

"What makes you always quarrel with Dr. Thorne?" said a girl friend, one evening. "All the other girls are crazy over him, and you sometimes act as if you hated him. I believe he likes you all the better for it, though; for he watches you so much."

"Nonsense, Sue; your imagination is running away with you!" said Laura, coloring deeply as she caught the gaze of those earnest brown eyes fixed upon her at that very moment; and then she flirted desperately with Will Dayton the rest of the evening.

The owner of the brown eyes was not deceived, however; he was thinking of the last time he had met this young lady at Mrs. Blake's. He came in without knocking, one evening, and as he stood in the hall he saw before him a very pretty picture.

Laura was rocking Baby Blake to sleep, singing a low, sweet cradle song, and Tommy stood behind her industriously taking out all her hair-pins, so that when she rose to lay the baby down she discovered her hair floating over her shoulders. Making a dexterous movement to catch the rogue who had done the mischief, she almost ran into the doctor's arms. What a change then! he could hardly believe this stately creature was the same girl who sat a moment before with the babe in her arms, and her hair ruffling over her shoulders. Her pride aided her to make a haughty exit; but he should have seen her as she ran home crying with vexation. After that the treatise on diphtheria was laid aside, and the doctor took up a new study, evidently more interesting, namely, the character of a beautiful but willful young lady.

Sometimes he thought she was as much interested in him as he was in her; then she would snub him, until he was very doubtful. I do not know how long things would have gone on in this way had not Fate taken it in hand.

The Lamonts had their trunks all packed for a summer trip, when Tommy was taken ill. He begged so piteously for his dear Miss Laura that she resolved to postpone going away for a few days.

Her mother tried to reason her out of it; but all the arguments of new dresses and the delightful seashore was powerless to move her.

"My new dresses can wait," she answered; and, donning a calico wrapper, started for Tommy's bedside.

His illness proved to be a fever that brought him near death's door; but Laura never flinched, even when she knew the danger to herself. The mother kept the other children away, and Aunt Prue helped Laura nurse the boy. When the worst came, Dr. Thorne remained also, and together he and Laura brought the little fellow back into his place in life. Then Laura went home; and, although she did not take the fever, she was sick for several days, her mother and Aunt Prue tending her with a devotion charming to behold.

Of course they must consult the doctor, who prescribed rest and quiet; but left a little note for the young lady's own perusal.

"Another prescription, my dear," said her mother; and Laura read:

> DEAREST: Be my wife. It shall be the one aim of my life to make you happy.
> ALEXANDER THORNE.

That was all; just those few lines; but, strange to say, they made her well immediately. And Aunt Prune had the satisfaction of saying, "I told you so."

Operating on Animals.

Many who read the following will recall the story of the good lion, who was grateful to the girl for extracting a thorn from his paw:

"A monkey at the Alexandra Palace, London, was recently suffering from toothache, so they put him into a bag, whence only his head protruded, and handed him over to the dentist.

"Pug screamed and snapped, and threatened to be very troublesome, but when the dentist managed to get his hand on the abscess and gave relief, the monkey's demeanor changed entirely.

"He laid his head down quietly for examination, and without the use of the gas submitted to the removal of a stump and a tooth as quietly as possible.

"A large bear at the Berlin Zoo had become blind through a cataract on both eyes. They strapped him up, chloroformed him, had him treated by an oculist, and, when next he was allowed to come into the light, and noticed that he could see clearly, the great brute winked and capered in ecstasy."

A Little Hero.

A house belonging to Capt. Bennett, of Mackinac, situated on the north shore, near the Schneaux, was burned last week Wednesday night. The three children of the Indian who had charge of the place had been left locked up in the house, while he and his wife were visiting his wife's mother. The oldest of the children was a boy 8 years of age. The house took fire in the night, and the boy, not being able to get out of the doors, and the windows being securely fastened, was only able to escape by taking an ax and chopping his way out of a window. He then took the younger children out. They remained about the house till morning, wrapping their feet up in some blankets to keep them from freezing. They waited until noon the next day for their parents to come, and, they not doing so, the little fellow put the two smaller ones on a hand-sled and hauled them down to their grandfather's, four miles distant.—*Northern (Mich.) The American Tea-Cup.

If the giant intellects of the Statistical Bureau are not at fault, the patrons of the American tea-table and of the American coffee-cup are rapidly increasing. Taking the range of years from 1830 to 1878, it appears that the consumption per capita of tea has increased from 0.53 of a pound in 1830 to 1.36 in 1878. A similar increase is noted in respect of coffee. The consumption per capita of population of coffee in 1830 was 3.0 pounds, and has increased in 1878 to 6.5 pounds.

A Big Gun.

Sir William Armstrong & Co. are executing an order for a 20-ton breech-loading gun for the Government of Canada, the largest breech-loader yet manufactured, and the gun is shortly to be put upon trial under the supervision of the staff of the School of Gunnery, Shoeburyness. Should the experiments prove successful, orders will be given for the manufacture of five other weapons of similar dimensions. It is proposed to use these guns for coast defense.

NEXT year the Belgians intend to celebrate, with all becoming pomp and ceremony, the fiftieth anniversary of the independent existence of Belgium as a kingdom.

VETOED.

Message of President Hayes Vetoing the Army Appropriation Bill.

TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: I have maturely considered the important questions presented in a bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," and I now return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with my objections to its approval.

The bill provides, in the usual form, for the appropriation required for the support of the army during the next fiscal year. If it contained no other provisions it would receive my prompt approval. It includes, however, further legislation which, attached as it is to appropriations which are requisite for the efficient performance of some of the most necessary duties of the Government, involves questions of the gravest character.

The sixth section of the bill is amendatory of a statute now in force in regard to the authority of persons in the civil, military and naval service of the United States at the place where any general or special election is held in any State. This statute was adopted Feb. 25, 1865, after a protracted debate in the Senate, and almost without opposition in the House of Representatives, by the concurrent votes of both of the leading political parties of the country, and became a law by the approval of President Lincoln.

> Section 5,528. Every officer of the army or navy, or other person in the civil, military or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, or to keep peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years, was re-enacted in 1874, in the Revised Statutes of the United States.

> Section 2,002. No military or naval officer or other person engaged in civil, military or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States.

The amendment proposed in this statute in the bill before me omits from both of the foregoing sections the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." The effect of the adoption of this amendment may be considered—First, upon the right of the United States Government to use military force to keep peace at elections for members of Congress; and, second, upon the right of the Government by civil authority to protect these elections from violence and fraud.

In addition to the sections of the statute above quoted, the following provisions of the law relating to the use of the military power at elections are now in force:

> Section 2,003. No officer of the army or navy of the United States shall prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State; or in any manner interfere with the freedom of any election, in any State, or with the exercise of the free rights of suffrage in any State.
>
> Section 5,519. Every officer or other person in the military or naval service, who, by force, threat, intimidation, order, advice or otherwise, prevents, or attempts to prevent, any qualified voter of any State from freely exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election in such State shall be fined not more than $5,000, and imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years.
>
> Section 5,520. Every officer of the army or navy who prescribes, or fixes, or attempts to prescribe or fix, whether by proclamation, order or otherwise, the qualifications of voters at any election in any State, shall be punished as provided in the preceding section.
> Section 5,531. Every officer or other person in the military or naval service, who, by force, threat, intimidation or otherwise, compels, or attempts to compel, any officer holding an election in any State to receive the vote from a person not legally qualified to vote, or who imposes or attempts to impose any regulations for conducting any general or special election in any State different from those prescribed by law, or who interferes in any manner with any officer of election in the discharge of his duty, shall be punished as prescribed in section 5,528.
> Section 5,532. Every person convicted of any of the offenses specified in the preceding sections shall, in addition to the punishments therein severally prescribed, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit or trust under the United States; but nothing in those sections shall be construed to prevent any officer, soldier, sailor or marine from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to the laws of the State in which he offers to vote.

The foregoing enactments would seem to be sufficient to prevent military interference with elections; but the last Congress, to remove all apprehension of such interference, added to this body of the law section 15 of the act entitled "An act making an appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, which is as follows:

> SEC. 15. From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the army of the United States as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases, and under such circumstances, as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the constitution, or by the act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section; and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

This act passed the Senate, after full consideration, without a single vote recorded against it on its final passage, and by a majority of more than two-thirds it was concurred in by the House of Representatives.

The purpose of the section quoted was stated in the Senate by one of its supporters as follows: "Therefore, I hope, without getting into any controversy about the past, but acting wisely for the future, that we shall take away the idea that the army can be used by a General or special Deputy Marshal, or any Marshal, merely for election purposes, or a posse ordering them about polls, or ordering them anywhere else where there is no election going on to prevent disorders or suppress disturbances that should be suppressed by the peace officers of the State, or, if they must bring others to their aid, they should summon unauthorized citizens and not summon the officers and men of the army as a posse comitatus to quell disorders, and thus get up a feeling which will be disastrous to the peace among the people of the country."

In the House of Representatives the object of the act of 1878 was stated by the gentleman who had it in charge in similar terms. He said: "But these are all minor points, and insignificant points compared with the great principle which was incorporated by the House in the bill in reference to the use of armed men in peace. The Senate had already included what they called, and what we might accept, as a principle, but they had stricken out the penalty and had stricken out the word 'expressly,' so that the army might be used in all cases where implied authority might be interfered with. The House committee planted themselves firmly upon the doctrine that, rather than yield this fundamental principle, for which for three years this House had struggled, they would allow the bill to fall, notwithstanding the reforms that we had secured, regarding these reforms of but little consequence alongside of the great principle that the army of the United States in time of peace should be under the control of Congress and obedient to its laws. After a long and protracted negotiation, the Senate committee has conceded that principle in its length and breadth, including the penalty which the Senate had stricken out. We bring you back, therefore, a report—a report with the alteration of a single word, which lawyers assure me is proper to be made, restoring to this bill the principle for which we have contended so long, and which is so vital to secure the rights and liberties of the people. Thus have we this day secured to the people of this country the same great protection against a standing army which cost the struggle of 200 years for the Commons of England to secure for the British people."

From this brief review of the subject, it sufficiently appears that under the existing laws there can be no military interference with elections. No case of such interference has, in fact, occurred since the passage of the act last referred to. No officer of the United States has appeared under orders at any place of election in any State. No complaint even of the presence of United States troops has been made in any quarter. It may, therefore, be confidently stated that there is no necessity for the enactment of section 6 of the bill before me to prevent military interference at elections.

The laws already in force are all that is required for that end. But that part of section 6 of this bill which is significant and vitally important is the clause which, if adopted, will deprive the civil authorities of the United States of all power to keep peace at Congressional elections. Congressional elections, in every district, in a very important sense, are justly a matter of political interest and concern throughout the whole country. Each State—every political party—is entitled to a share of the power which is conferred by legal and constitutional suffrage. It is the right of every citizen possessing the necessary qualifications prescribed by law to cast one unintimidated ballot, and to have his ballot honestly counted. So long as the exercise of this power and the enjoyment of this right are common and equal, practically as well as formally, submission to suffrage will be accorded loyally and cheerfully, and the departments of the Government will feel the true vigor of the popular will thus expressed. Two provisions of the constitution authorize legislation by Congress for the regulation of Congressional elections.

Section 4 of Article I. of the constitution declares:

> The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State, by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The Fifteenth amendment to the constitution is as follows:

> Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.
> Sec. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The Supreme Court has held that this amendment invests citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is within the protecting power of Congress. That right the court declares to be the exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. The power of Congress to protect this right by appropriate legislation is expressly affirmed by the court of national legislation; to provide safeguards for free and honest elections, is necessary, as experience has shown, not only to secure the right to vote to the enfranchised race at the South, but also to prevent fraudulent voting in the large cities of the North. Congress has, therefore, exercised the power conferred by the constitution, and has enacted certain laws to prevent discrimination on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude, and to punish fraud, violence and intimidation of Federal elections.

Attention is called to the following section of the Revised Statutes of the United States viz: Section 2,004, which guarantees all citizens the right to vote without distinction on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. Sections 2,005 and 2,006, which guarantee to all citizens an equal opportunity, without discrimination, to perform all the acts required by law as a prerequisite or qualification for voting. Section 2,022, which authorizes the United States Marshal and his deputies to keep peace and preserve order at Federal elections. Section 2,024, which authorizes the United States Marshal and his deputies to summon a posse comitatus whenever they, or any of them, are forcibly resisted in the execution of their duties under the law and are prevented from executing their duties by violence. Section 5,522, which provides for the punishment of the crime of interfering with Supervisors of Election and Deputy Marshals in the discharge of their duties at elections of Representatives in Congress.

These are some of the laws on this subject, which it is the duty of the Executive Department of the Government to enforce.

The intent and effect of the sixth section of this bill is to prohibit all civil officers of the United States, under a penalty of fine and imprisonment, from employing any adequate civil force for this purpose at the place where their enforcement is most necessary, namely: At places where Congressional elections are held. Among the most valuable enactments to which I have referred are those which protect the Supervisors of Federal elections in the discharge of their duties at the polls. If the pending legislation should become a law, there is no power vested in any officer of the Government to protect from violence the officers of the United States engaged in the discharge of their duties. Their rights and duties under the law will remain, but the National Government will be powerless to enforce its own statutes. The States may employ both military and civil power to keep the peace and enforce the laws at State elections. It is now proposed to deny to the United States even the necessary civil authority to protect national elections. No sufficient reason has been given for this discrimination in favor of a State and against national authority.

If well-founded objections exist against the present national Election laws, all good citizens should unite in their amendment. Laws providing safeguards of elections should be impartial, just and efficient. They should, if possible, be so non-partisan and fair in their operation that the minority party out of power will have no just grounds to complain. The present laws [have in] practice unquestionably conduced to the prevention of fraud and violence at elections. In several of the States members of different political parties have applied for the safeguards which they furnish.

It is the right and duty of the National Government to enact and enforce the laws which will secure free and fair Congressional elections. The laws now in force should not be repealed except in connection with the enactment of the measures which will better accomplish that important end. Believing that section 6 of the bill before me will weaken, if it does not altogether take away, the power of the National Government to protect Federal elections by the civil authorities, I am forced to the conclusion that it ought not to receive my approval. That section is, however, not presented to me as a separate and independent measure, but is, as has been stated, attached to the bill making the usual annual appropriations for the support of the army. It makes a vital change in the Election law of the country, which is in no way connected with the use of the army. It prohibits, under heavy penalties, any person engaged in the civil service of the United States from having any force at the place of any election prepared to preserve order, to make arrests, to keep the peace, or in any manner to enforce the laws. This is altogether foreign to the purpose of an army appropriation bill.

The practice of tacking to the Army Appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail until more than forty years after the adoption of the constitution. It has become the common practice. All parties, when in power, have adopted it. Many abuses and a great waste of public money have in this way crept into appropriation bills. The public opinion of the country is against it. The States which have recently adopted constitutions have generally provided a remedy for the evil by enacting that no laws shall contain more than one subject, which shall be plainly expressed in its title. The constitutions of more than half of the States contain substantially this provision.

The public welfare will be promoted in many ways by a return to the early practice of the Government and to the true principle of legislation, which requires that every measure shall stand or fall according to its own merits. If it was understood that to attach to an appropriation bill a measure irrelevant to the general object of the bill would imperil and probably prevent its final passage and approval, a valuable reform in the parliamentary practice of Congress would be accomplished.

The best justification that has been offered for attaching irrelevant riders to appropriation bills is that it is done for convenience sake, to facilitate the passage of measures which are deemed expedient by all branches of the Government which participate in the legislation.

It cannot be claimed that there is any such reason for attaching this amendment of the Election law to the Army Appropriation bill. The history of the measure contradicts this assumption. A majority of the House of Representatives in the last Congress was in favor of this section to this bill. It was known that a majority of the Senate was opposed to it, and that as a separate measure it could not be adopted. It was attached to the Army Appropriation bill to compel the Senate to assent to it. It was plainly announced to the Senate that the Army Appropriation bill would not be allowed to pass unless the proposed amendments of the Election laws were adopted with it. The Senate refused to assent to the bill on account of this irrelevant section. Congress thereupon adjourned without passing the Appropriation bill for the army, and the present extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress became necessary to carry on the Government.

The ground upon which the action of the House of Representatives is defended has been distinctly stated by many of its advocates.

A week before the close of the last session of Congress the doctrine in question was stated by one of its ablest defenders, as follows: "It is our duty to repeal these; it is not worth while to attempt to repeal except upon an appropriation bill. The Republican Senate would not agree to, nor the Republican President sign, the bill for such repeal. Whatever objection to legislation upon appropriation bills may be made in an ordinary case does not apply where free elections and the liberty of citizens are concerned. We have power to vote the money. Let us annex conditions to it and insist upon a redress of the grievance. The Senate represents States. We represent the tax-payers of the republic. We, therefore, by the very terms of the constitution, are charged with the duty of originating the bills which grant the money of the people. We claim the right which the House of Commons in England established after two centuries of contest, to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances."

By another distinguished member of the House it was said: "The right of the representatives of the people to withhold supplies is as old as English liberty. History records numerous instances where the Commons, feeling that the people were oppressed by a law that the Lords would not consent to repeal by the ordinary methods of legislation, obtained redress at last by refusing appropriations unless accompanied by relief measures."

That question of gravest magnitude, and new in this country, was raised by this course of proceeding, and was fully recognized also by its defenders in the Senate. It was said by a distinguished Senator: "Perhaps no greater question, in the form in which we are brought to consider it, was ever considered by an American Congress, in time of peace, for it involves not only the merits and demerits of laws which the House bill proposes to repeal, but involves the rights, the privileges, the powers, the duties, of the two branches of Congress and of the President of the United States."

Upon the assembling of this Congress, in pursuance of the call for an extra session, which was made necessary by the failure of the Forty-fifth Congress to make the needful appropriations for the support of the Government, the question was presented whether the attempt made in the last Congress to engraft, by construction, a new principle upon the constitution should be persisted in or not. This Congress has ample opportunity and time to pass the appropriation bills and also to enact any political measures which may be determined upon in separate bills and by the usual and orderly methods of procedure. But the majority of both houses have deemed it wise to adhere to the principle asserted and maintained in the last Congress by the majority of the House of Representatives. That principle is that the House of Representatives has the sole right to originate bills for the raising of revenue, and, therefore, has the right to withhold the appropriations upon which the existence of the Government may depend, unless the Senate and President shall give their assent to any legislation which the House may see fit to attach to appropriation bills. To establish this principle is to make a radical, dangerous and unconstitutional change in the character of our institutions.

The various departments of the Government and army and navy are established by the constitution, or by laws passed in pursuance thereof. Their duties are clearly defined, and their support is carefully provided for by law.

The money required for this purpose has been collected from the people and is now in the treasury, ready to be paid out as the appropriation bills are passed. Whether the appropriations are made or not, the collection of taxes will go on. The public money will accumulate in the treasury. It was not the intention of the framers of the constitution that any single branch of the Government should have power to dictate the conditions upon which this treasure should be applied to the purposes for which it was collected. Any such intention, if it had been entertained, would have been plainly expressed in the constitution.

That a majority of the Senate now concurs in the claim of the House adds to the gravity of the situation, but does not alter the question at issue. The new doctrine, if maintained, will result in a consolidation of unchecked and despotic power in the House of Representatives. A bare majority of the House will become the Government. The Executive will no longer be what the framers of the constitution intended, an equal and independent branch of the Government. It is clearly the constitutional duty of the President to exercise his discretion and judgment upon all bills presented to him, without constraint or redress from any other branch of the Government.

To say that a majority of either or both houses of Congress may insist on the approval of a bill, under the penalty of stopping all of the operations of the Government, for want of the necessary supplies, is to deny to the Executive that share of the legislative power which is plainly conferred by the second section of the seventh article of the constitution. It strikes from the constitution the qualified negative of the President. It is said that this should be done because it is the peculiar function of the House of Representatives to represent the will of the people; but no single branch or department of the Government has exclusive authority to speak for the American people. The most authentic and solemn expression of their will is contained in the constitution of the United States.

By that constitution they have ordained and established a Government whose powers are distributed among co-ordinate branches, which, as far as possible, consistently with a harmonious co-operation, are absolutely independent of each other. The people of the country are unwilling to see the supremacy of the constitution replaced by the omnipotence of any department of the Government.

The enactment of this bill into a law will establish a precedent which will tend to destroy the equal independence of the several branches of the Government. Its principle places not merely the Senate and Executive, but the judiciary also, under the coercive dictation of the House.

The House alone will be the judge of what constitutes a grievance, and also of the means and measure of redress. An act of Congress to protect elections is now the grievance complained of, but the House may, on the same principle, determine that any other act of Congress—a treaty made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate—a nomination or appointment to office, or a decision or opinion of the Supreme Court—is a grievance, and that a measure of redress is to withhold appropriations required for the support of the offending branch of the Government.

Believing that this bill is a dangerous violation of the spirit and meaning of the constitution, I am compelled to return it to the house in which it originated without my approval. The qualified negative with which the constitution invests the President is a trust that involves a duty which I cannot decline to perform, with a firm and conscientious purpose to do what I can to preserve, unimpaired, the constitutional powers and equal independence not merely of the Executive, but of every branch of the Government, which will be imperiled by an adoption of the principle of this bill.

I desire earnestly to urge upon the House of Representatives a return to the wise and wholesome usage of the earlier days of the republic, which excluded from appropriation bills all irrelevant legislation.

By this course you will inaugurate an important reform in the method of Congressional legislation. Your action will be in harmony with the fundamental principles of the constitution and the patriotic sentiment of nationality, which is their firm support; and you will restore to the country that feeling of confidence and security and repose which are so essential to the prosperity of all our fellow-citizens.

A DISTINGUISHED Senator of Georgia has quit the timber traffic for the 'possum trade. One night recently he experimented with a raft of lumber, selling the raft-load of 950 feet for $13. The following night he went 'possum hunting, killed thirty-two 'possums and sold them for $16. This contrast struck the statesman so forcibly that he has donned the hunter's buckskin and moccasins once for all.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

Only a Dancing Girl.

BY W. S. GILBERT.

Only a dancing girl,
With an unromantic style,
With borrowed color and curl,
With a fixed mechanical smile,
With many a hackneyed wile,
With ungrammatical lips,
And corns that mar her trips.

Hung from the flies in air,
She acts a palpable lie;
She's as little a fairy there
As unpoetical I!
I hear you asking, why,
Why in the world I sing
This tawdry, tinseled thing?

No airy fairy she,
As she hangs in arsenic green
From a highly impossible tree
In highly impossible scene
(Herself not over clean.)
For fays don't suffer, I am told,
From bunions, coughs or colds.

And stately dams that bring
Their daughters there to see,
Pronounced the "dancing thing"
No better than she should be,
With her skirt at her shameful knee,
And her painted, tainted phiz;
Ah, matron, which of us is?

(And in sooth it oft occurs
That while these matrons sigh,
Their dresses are lower than hers,
And sometimes half as high;
And their hair is hair they buy,
And they use their glasses, too,
In a way she'd blush to do.)

But change her gold and green
For a coarse merino gown,
And see her upon the scene
Of her home, when coaxing down
Her drunken father's frown,
In his squalid cheerless den;
She's a fairy truly, then!

Boys as Bridesmaids.

Fashion in France now prescribes two tiny pages to serve instead of bridesmaids at the wedding ceremony. These are chosen from the prettiest of the boy relatives of the bride or bridegroom. They are dressed in velvet of the bride's favorite color. At a recent wedding the tiny court dress worn was of sapphire velvet, with white silk stockings, and velvet shoes with diamond buckles. A bouquet, composed of a rosebud, an orange blossom, and a branch of myrtle, was attached to the left side. These pages perform the usual role of the bridesmaids, carry the bride's bouquet and gloves, and also meet her and assist her from and to the carriage step.

About Lacing.

An English clergyman recently preached as follows:

"When the door closes on the light and splendor of the revel, the vail is drawn quickly across—the public are shut out; but the true physician, of souls as well as of bodies, will invite you to enter that gloomy apartment, and hear the stern verdict upon another which to-morrow may be pronounced on you—'Death from natural causes!' Lay no such flattering unction to your soul. 'Death from rut in the liver and corn on the heart, produced by tight lacing.' These are the very words of a leading physician of the day to me."

Feminine reader would you like it to be engraved upon your tombstone, that you died of a liver-rut or a heart-corn? If not—let out a little!—Buffalo Commercial.

A Shameful Libel.

The Boston Transcript is responsible for the following: "A woman will go a shopping tour in search of a score of dissimilar articles. The ribbon must be ten and a half inches long and a half finger wide; the carpet must be like Mrs. Spriggins', only that she wants hers brown where Mrs. S.'s is green; the first knot in the string she carries in her pocket is the width of the window curtain; the second knot the length of Susie's skirt; the third knot of the picture cord, and the whole string the distance round the center table. Besides these she has buttons to buy, cotton to select, silk to match, etc., and she will come home at night without having made a single blunder, with a full satchel and an empty pocketbook, and an express packages will be arriving for a week to come. But the strangest part of this strange, eventful story is, that she can also tell you off-hand the costume of every lady she saw during her tour, either on the street or in any of the numerous shops visited. Can a man do this?"

When are Women Most Lovely?

We have received from a young lady a question which is so interesting and invites our consideration of a theme so delicate and delightful, that we are fairly forced to answer it at length. This is what she writes:

"SIR:—Will you be kind enough to tell me, are young ladies considered more lovely, and thought preferable, at the ages of from eighteen to twenty-two, or from twenty-two to twenty-five, or six? You will understand me, do men most admire them. B."

Before proceeding to our answer, let us thank our lovely friend for refraining from any attempt to bias our judgment by giving even a hint of her own age. She probably thought if she did so, natural gallantry might lead us away from a cool, judicial view of the subject and tempt us to give the preference to the types of maidenly beauty which appear in young women of her confessed years. And we do not deny that such might have been the case. As it is we are left entirely in the dark as to the class to which she herself belongs—whether she is between eighteen and twenty-two, or between twenty-two and twenty-five; and so we are able to answer her question on its intrinsic merit.

Loveliness in woman, though it may vary in its character and manifestations at different periods of life, is not the property of youth only. There is a great and undeniable charm in the fresh beauty of eighteen, to which inexperience and early romance lend perhaps additional fascination. A pretty girl of that age has been untouched by care, and who knows of the world through imagination only, is a very delightful object, and many men may wish they might take captive her first affections. Between eighteen and twenty-two the change of a girl, so far as the charms of her person go are not likely to be great; but in that time, by longer intercourse with society and by natural development, she may grow more companionable for men of maturity, and her carriage and self-control become improved. Those are important years in a young woman's life—the years during which, in our climate, the majority of the sex are married. And yet from twenty-two to twenty-five or twenty-six, a maiden may and generally does still further advance in attractiveness and add to the store of her charms. She is still young, but she has outlived many youthful fancies, and feels some of the dignity of womanhood. No better ages than those in a maiden's life, and never is she lovelier.

But why stop at twenty-six? What fairer women are to be found than many of those between twenty-six and thirty, and even older? Girls of eighteen may look on them as unsought old maids, and yet they are in their womanly prime, and may capture hearts which have been steeled against girlish fascinations. Oftentimes they make the best of wives, and men find a solace and companionship in their society which immaturity cannot give. They have the advantage of experience, and they have learned the lessons taught by longer contact with the world, while still they may not be averse to falling in love.

No, we assure our friend, it is not that a woman is eighteen, or twenty-six, or thirty, which makes her lovely in the eyes of men. She may be just as lovely at one age as at the other; but inasmuch as most marriages of women occur between the ages she mentions, it is safe to assume that the majority of men prefer to take wives who are not older. But all men of taste and discernment admire feminine beauty and loveliness whether they show themselves in budding youth or riper maturity; and we will dare assert that if our correspondent was really charming at eighteen, she will be more so at twenty-six, or that if she is now lovelier at the greater age.

But let her give no further thought to the subject. The beauty that is unconscious is the most alluring, and loveliness which exercises its sway without apparent effort is sure to make the best conquest. This we say in full confidence that the multitude of weddings which are to take place in the period after Easter will confirm the truth of our words. Let us hope that before another return of this delightful season our fair correspondent will be selecting her bridal outfit, having found by happy personal experience that we have wisely answered her important question.—N Y Sun.

The Dangerous Girl.

But now, at last, let us come to the real "dangerous girl"—the girl who seems by some fine fitness to walk into the empty room in a man's heart which has never before been opened to another woman and take up her abode there. "She is just as high as my heart," Orlando says of Rosalind, and there can be no more accurate measurement for a lover's delight in his sweetheart. She fits him, she suits him. She may not be pretty, she need not be clever; she may be both of these things in a remarkable degree, and a ball-room belle beside, and a chef d'œuvre of milliner's art into the bargain. But she has a gift over and beyond all these which renders all others subordinate. She has a way of listening which makes the most reserved man eloquent, and her little speeches, never audacious and rarely brilliant, have yet something tenacious about them, and cling to his memory when he sits over his fire by night or goes about his daily work. Then her face, her distinct and vivid personality, pursues him; it is the girl herself, not her bangles nor her flounces, that he remembers. It seems natural to him that he is thus taken possession of and held captive. No matter how cold he may have been heretofore, he now becomes ardent, warm hearted and rash. He may have admired a pretty girl with her furbelows and flounces and her nice perception of the most becoming; he may have been a little heavy hearted over the sumptuous beauty of the belle, and have enjoyed the society of the clever girl who saved him the trouble of doing all the talking, being able to do it herself so much more brilliantly. But this hankering after private felicity, this fervid belief in attainable happiness, this large faith in the future which marriage may assure to him, only followed his acquaintance with the "dangerous girl" who upset his boasted ideas of independent enjoyment, overturned all his preconceived notions of bachelorhood and set him longing to be engaged. Until he saw her he said with Benedick, "One woman is fair, yet I am well; another virtuous, yet I am well; but till all graces come into one woman, one woman shall not come into my grace."—Lippincott's Magazine.

The Fashions.

THE newest wraps have pannier attachments and bouffant backs.

SURPLICE pleatings of fine folds are laid on the fronts of dress waists.

THE newest veils are of black tulle with small dots made of very fine gold thread, and a border very lightly wrought in gold above them.

MUMMY cloth dresses are among the gayest of the imported cotton dresses, and are made entirely of one-striped fabric over which chintz figures are strewn.

A FEATURE introduced by Worth is the revival of shot silks of two colors mingled; these were formerly called changeable silks, and are used in plain effects with satins to correspond.

JACKETS opening to display waistcoats made of the plain material, gathered at the waist, are fashionable in washing material. All washing dresses are made up of two materials, either plain and figured or two shades of plain.

SATIN and French bunting makes a beautiful combination for walking suits. Lace will be used profusely on these costumes, but it is very poor taste to wear white or colored laces on dresses on the street.

THE pompadour styles are chosen for the gay youthful dresses that will be worn at summer resorts. These have over dresses very bunchily draped, a great deal of shirred trimming and lace, with fichus, jabots, and puffed sleeves.

THE handsomest all-black grenadines have satin brocaded leaves, diamonds, large spots, or lozenge shaped figures, and are made up over colored silk throughout, such as mandarin yellow, salmon, peony, gendarme blue, and rose pink

NEW hosiery for the spring and summer is made of the fine Sea Island cotton cream and ecru tints, embroidered on the insteps, or else on each side, in quaintly combined colors, such as pale blue with olive green, red with yellow, and pink with deep red; one of the fancies of the season is polka dots of embroidery in colors all over the instep of the Balbriggan stockings.

A GREAT many of the pretty new cambrics and soft-finished cottons are being made with round waists, especially for young girls. Usually they are cut with yokes, but some of the old-fashioned "French" waists are to be seen, and are usally accompanied by two skirts and a belt.

SILK handkerchiefs are introduced for making handkerchief costumes in the way hitherto confined to Madras bandanas. They are creamy white silk like twilled foulard, with quaint tracery and borders of black, blue, or red; they are used for the bouffant over-dress, with plain foulard skirts.

EVENING wraps for balls and the opera are made of new white brocades, partly silk and partly wool, in patterns that look like embroidery, and are trimmed with white cord and pearl passementaries, cord fringes, and white Spanish lace. A long scarf of white Spanish lace is then worn over the head and shoulders.

A Bit of Daring.

A Colorado paper tells again the story of Steve Venard's fight with three robbers in 1866. The stage coming into Vevada, Col., had been robbed by three men, and the treasure box taken. A party set out for its recovery. Venard, armed with a Henry rifle, followed the trail alone into one of the wildest and roughest of spots in that wild and rugged region. The hills hung steep above. The waters of the ravine came tumbling down its steep bed of bowlders, with a rush and a noise which rendered no other sound audible. Venard attempted to cross the stream at the head of the fall. He walked on a short log to a rock. Above him rose the huge mass of granite, buttressed in front by two smaller rocks. Between these latter was an alley which led up the base of the Titan. His position was such as to look up the alley. At the base of the great rock Venard discovered the leader of the gang sitting on the ground drawing his revolver. Venard leveled his rifle upon the robber, 20 feet distant. At the same time he saw another of the gang pointing at him over the edge of a rock. There was no time to change his aim. He fired; the leader fell back shot through the heart. The other robber tried to shield himself further behind a rock, leaving the point of his pistol exposed over the top. Venard covered the spot with his unerring Henry, and when the head of the robber peered above the rock his brain was pierced with a bullet. There was yet another, but he was not to be seen. His pistol might at that moment be pointing at Venard. The latter clambered up to beard him in his den. He found the treasure, took the pistol from the dead, covered quickly the former with earth and leaves, and proceeded to hunt the missing robber. He found him running up the mountain 60 yards or more ahead. Venard fired and the robber fell. Another bullet and the last robber rolled down the hill—dead.

The Grasshoppers Rival.

Complaints about the English sparrows multiply and grow louder as these hardy little creatures spread over the country. The increase of sparrows along the Atlantic coast has been enormous and their dispersion very rapid; the whole east is full of them, and they are now overflowing into the western states and territories. It is well known that outside of city limits these birds are fast becoming a source of very serious mischief, devastating market gardens and flower-beds, and sweeping down upon grain fields in a way most disheartening to the farmer. Dr. Coues thinks that the western people ought to adopt measures to exterminate the breed. The strongholds of these birds in the west are comparatively few and isolated. The great plains offer a natural barrier to the western progress of the birds from the Mississippi, and if pains are taken to destroy the advance guard as fast as they move westward, the evils now suffered in the east may be long delayed or even avoided.

An Embarrassing Gift.

A Methodist minister in Michigan is undergoing great exercise of mind in regard to some barrels of beer which have come into his possession in a remarkable way, and which he would like to get rid of. Some time ago he went to Cleveland and asked a wealthy brewer in that city for a gift to his church. The brewer, after some delay, responded by sending several barrels of beer. The minister has no use for the beer. To sell it would hardly be in accordance with the rules and practices of the Methodist church. To give it to the poor would be unprofitable, besides the parson says the poor have already had enough beer. He wishes the brewer would take the ungodly stuff back and give him the money for it, but as yet the brewer has shown no disposition to do this.

Wear and Tear of a Humorist's Brains.

Did you ever think what an awful strain it must be on Mark Twain to be always doing something funny? His latest trick was to send as a wedding present to his friend, Frank Millet, a couple of logs of firewood prettily bound together with pink silk, and offered as "the costliest thing I could find in Paris." Everywhere the glad tidings of this funny feat are spreading, and it seems at first sight to have all the spontaneity and easy beauty that we attribute to a joking genius. But alas! who can tell how many sleepless nights Mr. Twain spent tearing his hair and racking his brain, to think of a joke that would be worthy of himself and fit to be transmitted to all nations?—New York Star.

An Economical Rich Man.

It is said of the late Asa Otis, of New London, Ct., who left nearly $1,000,000 to the cause of foreign missions, that probably no man spent less for personal adornment than he. He was never shabby nor untidy in appearance, but slung persistently to a linen suit of scant measure in summer, and a suit of prehistoric pattern in winter. He kept no horses, did his marketing himself, and carried home his purchases in a large willow basket.

Something About Pigs.

I breed pigs on a large scale, and I boldly affirm from my experience that the pig is more intelligent than any other beast, more courageous, cleaner and possessed of a more delicate organization.

I once bought thirty-six young pigs, and put them in a pen. For the first few days they behaved themselves admirably. Being a novice in the business of handling pigs, I thought this quietude was the result of their being well fed. What they were really doing was reflecting on their confinement, and devising a way to get out of that pen. At any rate, they got out. I searched for the missing thirty-six, and found them in my garden, eating lettuce and early peas. But with the help of all the men on the ranch I could not drive them back into the pen; they seemed to have forgotten where and how they got out. Around the pen they ran, but not one offered to get in. My men were yelling to exhaustion, and I was nearly wild with rage. Declaring that those pigs should go into their pen the same way they came out, I went to the house and loosened a huge half-blood Newfoundland dog that had an inborn dislike for hogs. "Put those pigs in their pen, and don't you dare to bite one of them." Fred, the dog, looked first at me and then at the pigs, and, making a quick jump at one small specimen, took him down. Standing over the prostrate pig, the dog growled savagely, and every now and then he gave him a severe shaking. When, by my command, the pig was released, it ran to a corner of the pen, leaped to the third board, turned slightly on its side, and scrambled through. The others followed as fast as possible. They would have scampered around that pen for a week, and not one would have revealed the place, if the sudden and overwhelming fright resulting from being held in the jaws of a hundred pound dog had not made this one betray the secret. Afterward the thirty-six pigs would tunnel under the fence and invade my garden, but when the dog was called, with wild grunts of alarm they rushed into their quarters. Soon it became necessary only to stand on the hill and yell, "Fred, Fred! pigs, pigs!" to make every hog within hearing run for that hole in the pen. Once, and only once, the big dog went over the fence to punish a small pig that had been uncommonly exasperating. The knowledge then and there absorbed by him lasted the rest of his life. He was willing to rest his forepaws on the fence to look over, and bark at the occupants of the pen, but when urged to go over he sulked, and said, by his looks, "I tried that once, and, believe me, it was not well."—New York Sun.

Money in Garbage.

Scribner for May has a paper, by Chas. H. Farnham, descriptive of the docks of New York and their picturesque and varied life, from which we take this interesting paragraph: "In the midst of all this commercial wealth, we met another sort of life at the garbage dump. The pier is built quite high, that the carts may rise above the heap of refuse on the deck of the lighter even at high tide. The space just under the floor of the pier, is closed with old planks, and divided into several rooms, one for storing bones, one for tin cans and old metal, one for old boots and shoes, and one for rags. At one dump a room is fitted up for living. The planks are lined with refuse pieces of oil cloth, then a layer of carpet is spread all around; more oil cloth is tacked on, and finally the walls are papered and the floors carpeted with more refuse pieces. The room is warm and habitable even there under the deck and but a foot above spring tide. But the whole scene is extremely repulsive, although the business is quite profitable. The city hires a trimmer to trim or pile the loads on the lighter. He lets out this work to two or three Italians for one-half of the pickings, and now and then visits his dump, dressed in broadcloth, kids, and diamonds. The Italians sell the bones, metal, and rags, and boots to peddlers, and thus make from $12 to $20 per week. The watchman on the pier told me that they live chiefly on the garbage, so that they save enough money in a few years to go home as a count and spree it awhile, and then return from sunny Italy to claw over the garbage of New York. Now and then they allow their wives and sweethearts to come from Baxter street and help pick. Then the garbage pile is covered with a picturesque company of grimy and ragged figures eagerly snatching refuse in a cloud of offal dust. It is a strange phase of life. They have their social distinctions, too, for the cartmen who collect the refuse consider themselves immeasurably superior to the pickers. And certainly they have, at least, the advantage of an honest and hard-working horse.

How George Honey Hunted Bats.

Here is a story far funnier than most of the anecdotes one finds under the caption of nouvelles a la main in the Journal Amusant or the Figaro. It is a story of George Honey, the distinguished actor, who, many years ago, while on a tour in the provinces, had taken lodgings in a humble house, somewhat the worse for wear. Soon after retiring he was awakened by a fluttering noise as of a bird around the curtain of his bed. He sprang up, struck a light, and saw a dark little creature with wings blundering about the room. Not being well acquainted with natural history, he did not recognize it as a bat, but determined to catch it—if possible—and examine it carefully in the morning. Taking up a felt hat he began to hunt and tried to capture the intruder for a long time in vain, but at last he pounced upon it, took it from under the hat, shut it up in a drawer, listened to its struggles to escape—wanting to be sure that he had caught it, and went to bed dreaming of flying dragons. But he was not destined to sleep long. Hardly had he dozed off when a further fluttering awaked him, and lighting another match he found another bat. After this one he had another hunt, caught it, put it in the drawer with its brother and again went to bed. Again, however, he was awakened in a similar manner; bats came not in single spies, but—if the expression be pardonable—in "battalions." Mr. Honey hunted diligently, making quite a collection of specimens, and put them all with great care in the drawer. Heated with the chase, he opened the window, and, tired out at last enjoyed a few minutes' sleep. Waking with morning light, he jumped out of bed and opened the drawer very cautiously to look for his bats; but lo and behold, there were no bats there. He opened the drawer wide, and then discovered that it had no back to it. He had, in fact, been passing all his night in catching the same bat, which had flown out at the back of the drawer as soon as he had put it in at the front, and when the window was opened had finally escaped. —Howard Paul, in American Register.

Houses of the People in New Guinea.

The houses of the New Guinea people are somewhat different in different localities, but the most general type is that found at Dorey Harbor. There is a considerable village of large houses built on piles in the water in the usual Malay style, and houses similarly raised on posts (but loftier) are found on the hills some miles inland. Each of these houses is large and accommodates several families, and they are connected by continuous platforms of poles and bamboos, often so uneven and shaky that a European can without difficulty walk on them. A considerable space separates this platform from the shore, with which, however, it is connected by narrow bridges formed of one or two bamboos, supported on posts, and capable of being easily removed. A larger building has the posts carved into the rude forms of men and women, and is supposed to be a temple or council house. This village is probably very like the pile villages of the stone age, whose remains have been found in the lakes of Switzerland and other countries. Similar houses are found in the Aru and Ke islands, in Waigiou, and on the southwest coast; and they are also common on the southeast coast, sometimes standing in the water, sometimes on the beach above high-water mark. These houses are often a hundred feet long, and sometimes much more, and are occupied by ten or twenty families. On the Fly river similar large houses occur, but, only raised a foot or two above the ground; while at mouth of the Utanata river, on the southwest coast, a large low house was found a hundred feet long, and only six feet wide, with nineteen low doors; but this was evidently only a temporary seaside habitation of a tribe who had their permanent dwellings inland.—Popular Science Monthly.

An Excentric Statesman.

Some curious anecdotes are told of M. Vaulabelle, the historian and ex-minister of 1848, who died the other day. Alphonse Karr relates that when he went to call on the new minister of public instruction he could find neither a messenger nor a clerk to announce him. He wandered from room to room, and at last a strong smell of tobacco made him suspect that the minister was not far off. In fact, M. Vaulabelle was smoking in bed and reading the newspapers. On being invited to breakfast, Alphonse Karr accepted, but remarked that there was no fire in the kitchen. "That does not matter, replied the minister; "my charwoman will soon be here, and she will fetch us some pork chops and a vol-au vent." The writer adds that M. Vaulabelle, all the time he remained minister of public instruction, never had at his official residence anything beyond a pocket-handkerchief and shirt-collar, which his charwoman renewed every morning, with a shirt and stockings twice a week. He used to say, "I have been placed here on sentry, and I do not wish to have any more impediments than a soldier on duty. Having brought nothing. I shall have nothing to take away when I am relieved." Under these circumstances, it is easy to believe the story told of a friend meeting M. Vaulabelle in the street, carpet-bag in hand, and asking him where he was going. "I have just been turned out of office," was the reply, "I am waiting for the omnibus to go home."—Paris Letter.

The Prompter in Private Theatricals.

The prompter, indeed, is often the most invaluable member of an amateur company. His functions are manifold; behind the scenes he is carrying on a whole drama by himself; ringing bells and getting portmanteaus, wine bottles, brushes, perambulators and all manner of stage properties ready for the actors as they need them; taking the part of mob when the playbook marks, "Excited shouts behind scenes;" beating drums and rattling peas as the creator of stage thunder storms; and all the while clinging fondly to the book from which ever and anon he hoarsely whispers the words of their parts to the actors on the scene. At times his anxious countenance appears round the screen to remind, in audible tones, the forgetful lover to "kiss the countess now; that'll do, don't hold her too long;" or to warn the hero as he makes his affecting exit backward, "You're walking into the fire-place, more to the left;" or the gray haired father as he bids his child farewell, "Strike your breast twice, and look upward; don't throw your head back, your wig's loose," and so on.—The University Magazine.

The Evils of Fondling Pets.

Writing of diphtheria, a correspondent of the Louisville (Ky.) Medical News makes the following remarks:

"The report of the epidemic at Darmstadt being concluded, allow me to make a remark as to its possible cause, one which I have not observed taken notice of in the correspondence on this singular outbreak of the disease. It is well known that women and children are in the habit of kissing pet cats and dogs, especially when these favorites are ill, with discharge from the nose, cough, and sore throat, and even use their pocket handkerchiefs to wipe away the secretion. I have seen this done frequently. It is a common saying, "There, the cat has got a cold; now it will go through the house;" and as this remark has been repeatedly fulfilled, it shows how careful people should be in avoiding contact with such a mode of contagion. I do not affirm this was the way in which the disease was contracted either within or without the palace walls, but I feel sure the habit of kissing pets is a source of danger that should be widely known and prevented.

A REASON.

As in the days of old
As conquering monarch held
As hostages, his foeman's sons,
To make his conquest sure;

So now, Almighty Love,

Our own souls may secure.

Farm and Household.

—Coal ashes do well as a fertilizer for tomatoes. Make your ground half soil and half coal ashes and the result will be surprising.

—A solution of carbolic acid in 300 parts of water has been found effective for scab. A strong decoction of tobacco is a good wash also.

—For throat distemper, grate fine a small green wild turnip, or, if dry, give a heaping spoonfull, mixed with bran or oats. Never fails. Good for cough, also.

—In hatching turkey eggs sprinkle them the last two weeks slightly every other day with water that has had the chill taken off. Some moisture seems to be necessary for turkey eggs.

—Get the best and never keep a poor cow the second year. No man can afford to keep a cow that will not make from 200 to 220 pounds of butter, or its equivalent in cheese, every year. Lastly make the very best article and get the top of the market. This is dairy economy, according to my experience.

—A successful dairyman feeds his cows night and morning the year round and in each feed puts a teaspoonful of salt. He considers this method of salting cows preferable to the usual one of giving animals salt once or twice a week and thinks his method adds largely to the amount of milk given.

—Every family finds more or less bones accumulating. Burn them with your wood, and the ashes thus enriched is one of the most valuable of all fertilizers. Money can not buy any article which will so fertilize your soil. Bones thus consumed will quadruple the value of wood ashes, which in themselves are among the best of soil enrichers.

—Shade trees are often planted too near to our dwellings, and too thickly, so as to make the house dark and damp and cheerless. Large evergreen are very much out of place on the sunny side of a house, while they form an appropriate screen and wind break along the cold and exposed sides of our buildings. Set out trees—it is a duty, but set them out judiciously.

—People say that Smith is a "lucky dog" because his crops are so much better than his neighbors'. There's no "luck" about it. Smith is an industrious and thoughtful farmer. He selects his seed with care; he drains his wheat fields; his fences are sound and keep out trespassing cattle. Thrift upon a farm depends upon a thousand little things, and Smith doesn't neglect them. That's the result of his success.

At the state farm at Monson, Mass., the cows are milked precisely at 5 A. M. and 5 P. M., and each cow's milk is weighed and the weight recorded. The record shows that 55 cows gave, in one week in June, 2¾ tons of milk, and in one week in December 2¼ tons of milk. The whole amount of milk produced during last year was a little over 120 tons. Seven cows have given an average of about 20 quarts of milk each per day.

—Fresh manure produces but little effect when applied to crops, but when it is well rotted it then contains much valuable soluble matter, absorbable by plants. In fresh manure the most important constituent of its soluble portion is potash, and it contains but small proportions of ammonia and phosphoric acid. Rotten manure, on the contrary, yields to the solvent action of water large amounts of nitrogen and phosphoric acid.

—At a recent meeting of the Farmers club, at Mercer Pa., the following recipe for making grafting wax was given: Three ounces of tallow, two ounces of beeswax, one pound of rosin. Melt the tallow, then add beeswax, and than the rosin, finely powdered and stirred gradually into the mixture. Work it well, as the children do their taffy, and put away in convenient pieces. When wanted to use, put a piece in hot water and work it over, when it will become pliable.

—The top of a fruit tree, to secure the best results in color and flavor of the fruit, should be kept open to the admission of air and sunlight. If some branches grow too fast for the harmonious balance of the tree, pinch out the buds at the end, and thus force the growth into the other branches that are not so thrifty. Five years of cultivation and watchful pruning, and you will never have occasion to remove large branches. It is a terrible loss to a tree to allow branches to attain a large size only to be slaughtered.

—Mr. Henry Lively, of Bucks county, who is partial to the Brown Leghorns, says that in the month of March his 15 pullets laid 284 eggs. In February these same pullets laid 258 eggs, the lowest number laid being 4, the highest 13. These fowls are confined in a coop 6 feet wide by 10 feet long, with yard attached 11 feet by 12½ feet, including a few moments' run occasionally on a small grass patch. These fowls are pure bred Brown Leghorns, bred from three pullets and from a cock brought direct from Bonney, by J. B. Long and sold by him to Mr. Lively.

—Lard and kerosene are good to keep lice from calves; sulphur mixed with salt is good to drive ticks from sheep. Calves, like all animals, should be kept growing from youth to maturity. Here is one place where the profit comes in. There is always a loss of time and feed, and more, too, by allowing young animals to "stand still" for six months or more of the year. Sheep are well clothed, and need shelter from the snow or rain, and perhaps from the very strongest winds, but cold agrees with them. Feed them well; give them plenty of water, in small flocks, keep them dry, and they may stay out in the cold and thrive. A close, dark pen is a poor place for sheep.

—Sprouting the white potato will advance the crop two weeks. They should be cut so that about two eyes are allowed to each piece, and these should be planted in hot beds, with a very thin covering of soil, or it is better to plant in boxes and set these in a hot bed, so that after they are properly sprouted they can be at once carried to the place of planting. If the nights should be any way cold, protect with a thin covering of straw when the plants make their appearance above ground. Some persons who want a large quantity sprouted cut the potatoes as desired, and spread them on boards boxes or crates, in a dark place, and when sprouted, say from an inch to an inch and a half, expose them to the light, moistening two or three times a week with tepid water. They should be planted out so that there is not more than two inches of soil over the top of the sprouts.

What Makes a Horse Shy.

A correspondent of Wallace's Monthly says there never was a shying horse that was not near-sighted. Such horses do not see the object until getting right on to it. Nothing will break the horse of the habit unless the blinders are discarded and an open headstall used. Treat the horse kindly. Never whip him, but try to coax him up to the object, that he may smell it. One of the worst shyers was broken by leading, riding and driving in a meadow where stones, stumps, boxes and buffalo skins were placed in different positions every day, the horse being led up to them and allowed to eat a few oats off the object. Let any one examine a well-behaved horse's eye, and then a "shyer's" eye, and note the difference. Be kind and gentle to a shyer.

Bible Errors.

Here is a bit of information which will do for that conventional scrap-book which is the property of every well-regulated household. Many editions of the Bible have been published during the last 300 years, and into not a few of them some peculiar errors have crept. What is known as the "Breeches Bible" (Geneva, 1560) was so called because Genesis iii., 7, was translated: "They sewed fig leaves together and made themselves breeches," instead of "aprons," as in the English version now used. In the "Treacle Bible" (1568) Jeremiah viii., 22, was made to read: "Is there no treacle in Gilead," etc., instead of "balm," and in 1609 the word was changed to "rosin," "balm" was first used in 1611. The "Vinegar Bible," printed in Oxford in 1717, by John Basket, derives its name from the heading of Luke xx., which was made to read; "The parable of the vinegar." The book had many other errors, from which it has also been called, after the printer's name, "A basket of errors." In 1631 a Bible was printed in England, and in 1732 another appeared in Germany, both of which made the seventh commandment read; "Thou shalt commit adultery," the word "not" being omitted. It has been very appropriately called the "Wicked Bible."

The Flirt at the Theater.

[Detroit Free Press.]

She sat in the front row of the parquette-circle the other night, and, when she wasn't flirting with the gentlemen whose faces she could see, she was discussing the people on the stage. She was a beautiful blonde, with dark brown eyes, and her face attracted much attention. A fair, white skin; rosy, dimpled cheeks; lips like cherries that grow nearest the sun, in the top of the tree; pearly teeth, the regular rows of which showed themselves whenever she chose to let her musical laugh be heard (which was often); and a pretty shaped head, crowned with a wealth of golden hair and the cunningest of hats. She talked aloud and even made up faces at the gentlemen who stared at her. Ordinarially such a character, even though a female beauty, would have been unpleasant at the theater, but somehow everybody seemed pleased with the lady. If T. G.'s glass did not deceive him, she was about four years old. The only portion of the play she seemed to understand and appreciate was a love making scene.

When the laughter that followed the exit of the lovers in the play had subsided, the little one turned to a young lady and said in a perfectly audible voice:

"Della, 'at's dess'e way cousin Deorge tissed oo's uver day."

The star was much disconcerted to hear a roar of laughter from a portion of the audience just as she made her tragic entrance on the next scene; but the tribulation was insignificant by comparison with that of a certain couple, who will henceforth leave the "little flirt" at home when they go to the play.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

The President's Proclamation.

Whereas, It has become known to me that certain evil-disposed persons have, within territory and jurisdiction of the United States, begun and set on foot preparations for an organized and forcible possession of, and settlement upon lands of what is known as the Indian Territory, west of the State of Arkansas, which Territory is designated, recognized, and described by treaties and laws of the United States, and the executive authorities, of the Indian country and as such is only subject to occupation by Indian tribes, the officers of the Indian department, military posts and such persons as may by privileged to reside and trade therein under the intercourse laws of the United States; and,

Whereas, These laws provide for the removal of all persons residing or trading therein without express permission of the Indian department and agents, and also of all persons whom such agents may deem improper persons to reside in the Indian country; now therefore, for the purpose of protecting the interests of the Indian nations and tribes as well of the United States in said Indian Territory, and of the duty of enforcing the laws governing the same, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, president of the United States, do admonish and warn all such persons so intending or preparing to remove upon said lands, or into said Territory, without permission of the proper agent of the Indian department, against any attempt to so remove or settle upon any of the lands of said Territory, I do further warn and notify any and all such persons who may so offend, that they will be speedily and immediately removed therefrom by the agent, according to the laws made and provided, and if necessary, the aid and assistance of the military forces of the United States will be invoked to carry into proper execution the laws of the United States herein referred to. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be fixed. Done at the city of Washington, this the 26th day of April in the year of our Lord 1879 and of the independence of the United States the 103d.

(Signed) R. B. Hayes,
By the President:
W. Evarts, Secretary of State.

Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no stubshot and will cut any sized log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two or three days, and can be made profitable in a locality where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

Hendricks or Tilden.

[Fort Wayne Sentinel.]

Putting out of view as unworthy of the consideration of democrats the argument for Mr. Tilden, that he is very rich and therefore able to pay well as a presidential candidate, and very cunning and therefore able to intrigue well in the campaign, the main argument for his candidacy is that without New York no democratic president can be elected, and that Tilden can carry New York and no other democrat can. In view of such an argument it may well be asked, Has New York become so poor in statesmanship that its wide borders encompass but one great democratic statesman, and that man S. J. Tilden? Is he alone, of all its able men, worthy to be chief of American democracy? Has New York become so sectional and selfish in its policy and patriotism, that no other man than Tilden can be permitted to receive a nomination for president? Must the democracy of the United States continue to be hewers of wood and drawers of water to the politicians of New York, to the Peltons and the Marbles and the Weeds, to the Robinsons and Dudley Fields, and the other parasites and satellites that cling to or revolve around the home of Tilden in Gramercy Park, as if its inmate were the central sun of American democracy? Are New England and Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, the east and the west and the south, states of the American union, or only provinces of New York? Are all these states ready to admit by another submission to New York dictation or New York wealth, that they have no democratic statesman able or fit to be president; that they have no political conscience but what Tilden's money can buy, or no political courage but what the threats of New York politicians, in the interest of Tilden and clamoring for him, can awe into submission? There are statesmen in the west and in the south; there is manhood there, and a vast army of democratic voters there, whose fertile fields and manly hands aid to create the wealth that fills the coffers of New York, and it is time New York politicians were made to know their existence and to feel their political power. It is good for the republic that it should be so. New York is a great and powerful state, imperial and even aspiring—a large factor in American politics. It no doubt represents and holds largely the moneyed wealth of the states of the union; but it does not represent altogether the brains, nor the statesmanship, nor the political conscience, nor the moral power, nor the voting power of the whole union. New York in 1868 and 1872 and 1876, had its choice of a presidential nominee for the democratic party, and while it could present a man of unsullied character and eminent ability like Horatio Seymour, its choice would be treated with honor and respect, but when it can not offer no other name than that of Tilden as its candidate, and shall still urge him for a fourth trial of a New York man, its assurance will demand a fitting rebuke.

But I do injustice to New York in these suggestive and derogatory questions, for they have no force except upon the idea that the Tilden politicians of New York shall again demand a nomination of Tilden, and respect for the democratic party leads me to believe that before the day of nomination comes, there will be such an expression of democratic opinion in regard to Mr. Tilden, as will make even a demand for his nomination an impossibility.

It is time that the public mind be undeceived on this question of Tilden's great popularity in New York. He has his friends and organs there, and they are busy and unscrupulous in his service, for his money pays them, and his talent and ability for political intrigue aids them to political preferment, and he undoubtedly has also a following, among some of that old class of politicians who with him in 1848 followed the lead of Martin Van Buren—Tilden's ideal of a statesman and political leader—in a secession from the democratic party, which for many years had honored and rewarded Van Buren, as it has honored and rewarded Tilden, far beyond the deservings of either.

Where is the evidence of Mr. Tilden's strength in New York? Does the fact that he has divided his party and kept it in constant broils, indicate it? Does the open opposition of many of the ablest and most prominent democrats in the state, and of the leading democratic press in New York, prove it?

But, say Mr. Tilden's friends, he has made war on Fraud and destroyed him; he has made war on Tammany Hall and John Kelly, and beaten them; he demanded Robinson, a converted republican, for governor, and he got him, he wanted John Biglow, another converted republican, for secretary of state, and he had him; he wanted Edward Cooper for mayor of New York, and he was chosen; and in many other ways he has shown his ability to prefer his friends and relatives and retainers to good offices, and to baffle and punish his enemies. It is not to be denied that by combinations with republicans and disaffected anti-Tammany democrats, seeking the offices controlled by the Tammany organization, and availing himself of a wide-spread popular clamor against Tammany Hall, Tilden has been able, or at least had the prestige of ability, to damage that organization and defeat its nominees; but has the democratic party in any following of Tilden been either purified or made stronger by his proceedings?

As compared with John Kelly, whom all who know him aver to be a man personally incorrupt, the tutor of Pelton and the patron of Marble and Smith Weed has no special claim to superior integrity, and how much Mr. Tilden's hostility to Kelly and Tammany Hall has to do with the fact that Kelly is known to have preferred Seymour or Hendricks to Tilden for president, those who know Tilden best can best answer. The struggle between a Tilden faction and an anti-Tilden faction for the control of Tammany Hall, is not specially edifying to democrats elsewhere than in New York. It seems to be a struggle for place rather than principle.

Mr. Tilden's influence in New York, be it more or less, is not the personal strength of great deeds or a great and pure character. It is not the strength of a party attachment, founded on a just respect for disinterested and honorable public service. His popularity, if such it may be called, is that of the leader of a faction, not of a great statesman and leader of men. There is an anti-Tammany faction in New York, which by coalescing with other factions has built up a Tilden faction in the state, but it cannot be called the democratic party of New York. That this aggregation of factions, growing out of personal rivalries and local politics in New York, is likely, under Tilden's lead, to turn republican votes away from Grant in 1880, no man believes. There is also in New York a Conklin faction of republicans. The position of that bold and relentless leader towards Hayes, as well before as since his inauguration as president, is well known. When Hayes was fighting Tilden in New York in 1876, the Achilles of New York republicanism "sulked in his tent," hoping in his heart that Tilden might win; for besides the gratification of his jealous spite against Hayes, Conklin was selfish and sagacious enough to know that Tilden's administration, if he were elected, would prove so marked a failure as to pave the way for a swift return to power of the republican party, and for a restoration of the prestige of Conklin; and notwithstanding the boasted victory of Tilden in 1876 and his supposed controlling influence in New York, Conklin is again a United States senator, by the vote of a republican legislature. Conklin now installed in the senate has, like the state of New York, "had enough of Tilden," and as between Tilden and Grant, no one doubts that all the ability and influence of Conklin and his faction in 1880 will be on the side of Grant.

The idea that Tilden alone can harmonize all the elements of New York opposition to Grant is a fallacy. Horatio Seymour might do it, but Tilden cannot, and it is time for New York to give place to a man of the west—not alone because he is a western man, for that would be a sectional and insufficient reason, but because the west can present an able, wise and ever faithful man, in a large and broad sense a national statesman—in a word, such a man as Thomas A. Hendricks, whom the democracy of the United States should delight to honor, and whom they may honor and trust with all confidence.

It is not wise or well for New York politicians, for the sake of a forlorn hope for Tilden, to stand in the way of Hendricks or of any other man the national democracy may choose for its leader, and it is full time for Indiana to assert its rightful influence as one of the states that the democratic party cannot afford to offend or to lose. Let the democratic press and people of Indiana henceforth speak a voice of no uncertain sound, as to what is due to itself and its ever-faithful champion—its victorious leader in many a well-fought field.

If Samuel J. Tilden be the ideal and representative of American democracy, its principles and its political methods; if he be the embodiment of its idea of reform and honest government, it is time for the party to know itself and what manner of principles and men it is made of. A great trial, perhaps the final trial of the democratic party, is to be made in 1880, and it behooves it to carry its heart in its hand to be seen of all men—it behooves it to have no leaders of doubtful ability or courage or honor, and to make no false steps.

As for myself, a democrat, speaking as I believe, the sentiment of a multitude of democrats in every state, I am free to say that in my judgment it is not possible that Mr. Tilden's further prominence in national politics can bring honor or success to the democratic party, or honor to himself. His nomination would be suicide, and the party has a higher mission, I trust, than to die in a vain effort to vindicate Mr. Tilden. That is a hopeless task, and the attempt, as thus far made, has only served to blacken a page in our country's history. Mr. Tilden's best atonement and highest duty to his party and his country now is, not further to waste his great wealth and waning vitality in a vain ambition, but to seek the repose of a graceful retirement. Letter From an Ex-Auburnite to His Sister.

LAURIN, MONTANA, APRIL 21, '79.

DEAR SISTER:—It is my desire now to write you a good long letter, and tell you all about our trip from the time we bid farewell to old Indiana, until we arrived in the wilds of the far-off and famous Montana, and tell you about the people, soil, climate, rivers, mountains, mines, etc., and how people get here, and what they do, describing the general scenery the best that I can.

We left Auburn the 31st of March and traveled ten days by rail and nine days by wagon, making a total of nineteen days travel. We were very much fatigued upon our arrival and of course we took advantage of a good rest, which we all were in need of. Since our leaving Auburn we have traveled over 2,000 miles and have seen much of the illimitable great west. We have seen the famous Mississippi and Missouri rivers, the great and renowned prairies of Illinois and Missouri, and crossed the broad plains of Nebraska, and in climbing over the Rocky Mountains, brilliant scenes present themselves to view, and one's eye never tires beholding the great scenery; we would never close our eyes until the evening shadows shut off the pleasing sights from our view. The first day of our travel brought us to Logansport, Ind., and the earliest twilight of the next morning found us at Springfield, Ill. During the second day's travel we were looking out upon the broad fields and well improved farms of Illinois; here the farmers were busily engaged tilling the rich, black, sandy soil of that most magnificent country; great herds of cattle and sheep were quietly feeding upon the green verdure which made us think of the vast difference between the mud of Indiana and the great sandy country of Illinois; the roads were as smooth as a floor and dry and dusty. There is also some very rough country through the state, but the fine country exceeds the poor. We crossed the great Mississippi at Quincy, Ill. The river here is nearly a mile in width, and its turbid waters dash madly on toward the sea. In crossing the great iron bridge we had a fine view of the city and the great steam-boats playing upon the river, also the high bluffs beyond the city. Now passing through Missouri we saw the finest country ever man beheld. I cannot find words to describe it; it far surpasses all imagination. As the night drew on, our train whistled for St. Joe, Mo., here we stopped over night, and next day, at 3 o'clock p. m., we left this beautiful city of the west, which we carefully surveyed. Here was our first observation of the Missouri river; we traveled its shores for nearly 30 miles, while the beautiful scenery presented itself to our view. The third day's travel landed us into the Iowa country, which was not very brilliant in my estimation. At 8:30 p. m., we landed in Council Bluff, Iowa, and remained until 9 a. m. the next day. Here the great commotion of emigration commenced to awaken the eyes of of our little party. As we came near the great Union depot we observed thousands of people, from all parts of the globe, assembled together, bound for all parts of the country west of the Missouri river. It put me in mind of a fourth of July in Auburn. We had a fast train from the time we left Auburn, until arriving at this place and here we had to board an emigrant train 24 coaches long, and filled, and not much standing room. We paid 75 cents extra for a seat in one of the rear coaches, and were glad of the chance, as we were to be four days and five nights on the road to Ogden. After an hour or so, our train started, crossed the Missouri river, and landed us in the city of Omaha, Nebraska. Here was another of the great sights of the west, the mammoth iron bridge, one mile in length and 140 feet high; the train was one hour in crossing the bridge. At this place can be seen what man can do, a great piece of mechanism, indeed it is. The great iron pillars under this bridge are eight feet in diameter and are sunk eighty feet below the surface of the water; the spans are about 200 feet in length. Leaving Omaha behind us, we started for the Rocky Mountains being three days crossing the plains of Nebraska. We became tired of the country, as it all looked alike; nothing seemed to draw our attention except a large herd of cattle and horses of probably two or three thousand head. The country here was very dry and sandy, and very thinly settled. The second day on the plains a magnificent sight came to view, it was the prairie on fire. Oh, how grandly the flames rolled up, like great clouds and volumes of black, curling smoke ascending heavenward, hiding the sun from our view. Take it all in all, it was a beautiful sight to behold. I must pass on and be more brief. As we neared the Rockies every eye was strained to the utmost to get the first sight of a mountain; at last, about as the evening shadows began to fold their wings over the great plains, we observed in the far distance a great high mountain. We all passed the night with the expectation of finding ourselves in the midst of the Rockies on the next morn, but we arose the next morning and found the same high mountain in advance. Here men, women and children were struck with amazement; after traveling all night toward the said mountain, and it still far ahead, they could not account for it. Some had an idea that the train had been running back; but not so; this great high rock was in Echo canon, about 150 miles in the distance, which we saw as we entered the canon on the morning of the fourth day. Here the great wonders of nature began to loom up before our vision. I am entirely unable to give a description of this great pile of earth and rocks that the Ruler of all things saw fit to leave for the human race to gaze and wonder upon. Great towering snow-capped mountains on every side seemed to lift their heads almost to the sky, and right beneath our feet great and awful precipices, thousands of feet in depth, stared us in the face. Here in the midst of this gorgeous scenery, a man would forget everything that ever troubled him in the past, no matter how severe it might have been. As we came to the 1,000 mile tree, (a tree 1,000 miles from Omaha,) tremendous cheering and shouting occurred, and about 200 shots were fired at the tree, and great excitement prevailed throughout the entire train. Our train of about 1,500 souls sped on, roaring over the great rocks, rumbling over bridges, spanning awful precipices, rushing through long, dark tunnels, cut through solid rocks for a mile in length, until we reached the "Devil's Slide," here another excitement prevailed. This slide is on the left hand side, going west, and about 200 yards from the track, running up the mountain about one mile; it is composed of two stone walls about 18 inches apart and about one foot in thickness, and from ten to forty feet in height. Many other beautiful sights are to be seen along the line of the Union Pacific R. R., but I will pass them by and proceed to "Weber canon;" here we ran for miles through perpendicular rocks from 300 to 2,000 feet high; in some places the rocks hung far over the passing train. After leaving this canon, we came out into the beautiful valley, the name of which I did not learn; here we found the valley thickly settled, and farmers were planting corn; peach, cherry, apple and pear trees were all in full bloom, and their fragrant perfume filled the air with their sweetness. Oh, how lovely everything looked in this pleasant valley of the great west. Leaving these happy, industrious people behind, we sped on down a beautiful river, and about 3 p. m. of the fifth day our train whistled into Ogden, Utah. Here we left the emigrant train and some of our new made friends, who were bound for California, Oregon, and other places in the west. We remained here for the night, and on the following morning departed for Blackfoot, Idaho, a distance of 181 miles north, on the Utah Northern road. This is a narrow-gauge road, and it is very unpleasant to ride upon it. We reached Blackfoot at midnight, and the next morning we organized a company of 8 men, and employed a man to take us to Virginia City, Ma. We paid him $120, $15 each. Our little party consisted of 9 men, one team and wagon, and an Indian pony, which the boys took turns at riding. Following are the names of our party: James Goetschius, Ind.; Steve Goetschius, Ind.; Mike Carigan, Ky.; Chas. Ferrell, N. Y.; Geo. Franks, Mo.; John Beck, Mo.; Carrey Walthall, Mo.; the driver, Dave Dee, and myself. After everything was ready we started out with cheerfulness for the great Ruby valley in Montana. At 11 o'clock a. m. the driver cracked his whip over his faithful steeds (for such they proved to be) and at night drew rein about 20 miles from our starting point, where we camped for the first night on the ground, on the bank of Snake river. Now this began to look perilous in the eyes of our young troops. I did not sleep much the first night, nor did others in the party. We thought of Indians drawing the cold steel through our scalps, and of the wild beasts that were prowling around our camp-fire, setting up the most hideous howling that mortal man ever listened to, ready at any moment to pounce upon us. But there we lay, our bed the ground, and our covering the starry firmament. When the grey streaks of morning put in an appearance, our little band arose and began to prepare breakfast. Oh, but this was fun at first, but it became a burden toward the last of our journey. Breakfast over we started on our weary route, and after 35 miles travel we camped again on the same river; here we went through the same maneuvers as we did the previous night. The third day we made good headway, and all the party felt happy with a fond hope of a safe journey. During the day Jim Goetschius had an idea that the fish would bite, and he prepared to make a trial of it. Jumping astride the little pony he rode gallantly away to the river, dismounted, tied the pony to a small brush, and proceeded to induce the mountain trout to invest in some fresh beef-steak; but the little fishes were slow of comprehension, and concluded not to trust the wily Indianian. In the meantime, while he was throwing out his most sincere inducements towards the inhabitants of the sparkling water, the pony being quite hungry, ate the bush off and loosened himself, and leaving the kind-hearted fisherman, speedily followed after the rest of the party, who were about 4 miles in advance. The disgusted fisherman threw pole and line into the river and started in hot persuit of the pony, but alas! he could not overtake him, and after 5 or 6 hours walk he found the party eating supper on Market Lake. Jim was tired and "swore-off" never to fish again. He said he would set 'em up when he got through if we would keep mum, and we gave our promise. About midnight the wolves made an attack upon us, but we soon conquered their forces, and morning found us all alive and well. This day we did not make headway, as the sand was very deep and the wind blew the dust in clouds across the plains. Our party suffered very much for want of water, but we finally camped for the night in "Devils' Gulch;" here we found some beautiful scenery. The next morning we started to climb the Rocky Mountains for the second time, and camped at the foot of a snow-capped mountain. The boys all went off into dreamland with the happy thought of not having to be bothered with Easter eggs on the morrow. Morning came and the driver reported the horses lost. We were all struck with astonishment, and I never saw such bad looking countenances as I saw at this moment. We all supposed at once that the Indians had driven off the team in the night, and left us entirely helpless, far among the wilds of Idaho. Leaving two of our party at the wagon, we all went in search of the lost animals; 9, 10, and 12 o'clock came and no tidings of the lost horses. The search was continued and about 2 p. m. we found the team about five miles from camp feeding along a small stream of water; when the glad tidings reached the camp, loud shouts of joy rang out on the clear mountain air, and away the party sped up and down the hills. We crossed the line into Montana on Monday, and the next morning surprised John and Lee Goetschius by calling on them for some refreshments. Thus ended our journey, and now our party separated in search of employment. There is plenty of work here, wages ranging from $35 to $50 per month on farms, and from $3 to $5 per day in the mines. In conclusion would say that this is the country for me, and it is my intention to make this my home for a few years at least. Thus far in all we have seen many wonders and sights. We never shall regret the trip to Montana.

I remain your loving brother,
J. F. KLINE.

THE EAST.

THERE were forty-nine failures in New York city during April, with liabilities of $1,199,883, and assets of $633,121. In April, 1878, there were seventy-three failures, and total liabilities of $9,880,000.

A HORRIBLE murder by a religious fanatic is reported from Pocasset, Mass. One Charles F. Freeman, a Second Adventist, had been attending revival meetings. Some days ago he claimed to have received a "wonderful revelation. He says the Lord directed him to sacrifice his little daughter, and declares she will rise again in three days. He sent word to the neighbors he would make revelations known, and offer orthodox sacrifice. A number of Second Adventists assembled at his house, but the child had been killed. The little one was transfixed with a knife, and her blood poured out upon a table, improvised as an altar."

FREEMAN, the Pocasset (Mass.) Adventist, and his wife have been committed to jail for the murder of their 5-year-old child. On the way to the prison both loudly proclaimed that the death of the child was in obedience to the divine mandate. A number of his Adventist neighbors sustain Freeman in his course. Many of them are well-to-do farmers. Some of those present at the meeting at Freeman's house on the day of the murder will be arrested on the charge of being accessory to the deed.

EDWARD PARR, of Philadelphia, aged 60, fatally stabbed his daughter, Susan Irwin, aged 30. The murder grew out of an old family feud.

THE suspension of Whittemore, Peet, Post & Co., one of the heaviest woolen dry goods firms in New York, is announced. Their liabilities are estimated at upward of $750,000.

THE man arrested in Philadelphia while trying to effect an exchange of some of the bonds stolen from the Manhattan Bank, of New York, turns out to be Johnny Dobbs, one of the most noted bank robbers in the country. He was the principal in the robbery of the Dexter (Me.) Savings Bank, which was attended with the murder of Cashier Barron, because he would not give up the keys of the safe. A reward of $5,000 had been offered for him, dead or alive.

THE trial of Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, which has been in progress before a synod of the Presbyterian church at New York for several weeks, was brought to a close the other day, resulting in his acquittal.

THE WEST.

The proposition to remove the capital of Missouri from Jefferson City to Sedalia has been defeated by a close vote in the lower house of the Missouri Legislature. The measure lacked only four of a constitutional majority....A fight between citizens and horse-thieves in Taney county, Mo., resulted in the death of two of the outlaws and two citizens.

GEORGE C. HARDING, editor of the Indianapolis Herald, and Calvin A. Light, of the Indianapolis Democrat, a Communist organ, engaged in an ink-slinging duel, in which Light got the best of the fight, while Harding got fighting mad. He bought a huge Colt's navy revolver and made a raid on Light's office, and at once opened fire upon him, while standing at the imposing-stone. Light dodged the first shot, and the ball struck a printer standing at his case, named Gerhard Linus, in the groin. Harding fired a second shot, which missed Light, but hit another printer named Richard Walters in the leg. The latter, fearing further damage, at once jumped through a window, and, in falling upon the pavement, suffered a fracture of both his ankles, which will lay him up for weeks and make him a cripple for life. Light escaped from his infuriated assailant by the free use of a good pair of legs, and fled to the police for protection.

ADVICES from Southeastern Kansas say that about 2,000 men have gone into the Indian Territory within the past week; also that rich silver mines have been discovered just south of the Kansas line, and claims in large numbers are being registered daily in the "Squatters' Registry Office," two miles from Baxter Springs, Kan.

BY an explosion of nitro-glycerine in a freight depot at Stratford, Ont., several lives were lost and 150 railroad cars and other property destroyed. The loss is estimated at $500,000.

A CONSIDERABLE number of the Southern negroes who emigrated to Kansas are returning to the South. They are making this move through a St. Louis commission house which has large Southern connections.

A LARGELY attended Southern Labor Convention, called for the purpose of devising measures to check the exodus of colored people, has just been held at Vicksburg, Miss. Resolutions were adopted declaring that the interests of planter and laborer are identical; that the colored race has been placed by the constitution and laws on a plane of legal equality with the white race; that the blacks shall be accorded the enjoyment of their civil and political rights; that the credit system, so prevalent in the South, based upon liens or mortgages on stock and crops to be grown in the future, has disturbed the entire laboring population, and should be discountenanced.——A national conference of colored men was held at the same time in Nashville, Tenn. It was called for the purpose of presenting the grievances of the colored race to the country. Representatives were present from nearly every Southern State, and from half a dozen Northern States. Ex-Congressman John R. Lynch, of Mississippi, presided.——The National Women's Suffrage Association held its annual convention at St. Louis last week. Nineteen States were represented. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. S. A. Spencer, Washington; Treasurer, Mrs. J. C. Spofford, Washington.

THE recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in relation to the Pacific Railroad companies, puts an effectual stop to all the efforts that have been made to prevent the Government from exercising its authority over the accounts of the Central and Union Pacific Companies, and compels them to proceed to comply with the law establishing a sinking fund to meet their indebtedness to the Government.

A PRIZE-FIGHT for the heavy-weight championship of the United States came off last week on Long Point island, near Buffalo. The contestants were John Dwyer and Jim Elliott. It was the quickest match, and at the same time the most terrific one, on record. In the brief space of twelve minutes and forty seconds Dwyer knocked time out of his antagonist on the twelfth round, sending him to ground unconscious. Both men were badly punished, but Elliott showed the worst pounding.

THE annual election of directors of the Michigan Central railroad was held at Detroit last week. The old directory was re-elected, and the road remains under the control of Wm. H. Vanderbilt.

WASHINGTON.

AT a Cabinet meeting the other day, called to consider the organized movement to occupy the lands in the Indian Territory, it was decided that the thing must be stopped at once, and to this end troops will be stationed on the highways leading to the Territory to head off the squatters.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

The Texas Pacific Railroad bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Johnston on the 2d inst., read at length, and referred. Mr. Saulsbury called up the resolution authorizing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to reopen the case of Senator Kellogg, and to investigate Judge Spofford's claim to Mr. Kellogg's seat. Mr. Hoar offered as a substitute a resolution reciting the action of the Senate at the time that Mr. Kellogg was admitted, and expressing the opinion that said proceedings were final and conclusive as to the right of Mr. Kellogg to a seat in the Senate for the full term for which he was elected. Consideration of the resolution was postponed for one week. Consideration was resumed of the bill to prevent the introduction into the United States of contagious or infectious diseases, and Mr. Garland made a speech to show the constitutional power to pass the bill, and the necessity for doing so.——The House was not in session.

Congress had a dull day of it on the 3d ult. The Senate was not in session, and the House devoted the day to the discussion of the bill reported from the Coinage Committee, amending the statutes relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates. The Democratic members of the House held a caucus and determined upon a line of action in regard to the Army Appropriation bill. They decided upon the exact terms of the measure to be separately passed in lieu of the sixth section of the Revised Statutes, it being also agreed that all consideration of the remainder of the bill shall be deferred until this independent political measure shall have been acted upon by the President.

Under the call of States a bill was introduced in the House, on the 5th inst., by Mr. Ladd to prohibit military interference at elections, and it was referred to the Committee on Judiciary. This is the bill agreed upon by the Democrats in caucus, and is as follows:

"WHEREAS, The presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people, and tends to destroy the freedom of elections; therefore,

"Be it enacted, etc., That it shall not be lawful to bring to or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in the State any part of the army or navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to enforce section 4, article 4, of the constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, on application of the Legislature or Executive of the State where such force is to be used, and so much of all laws as are inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed."

Mr. Eaton offered a similar bill in the Senate. There was a joint caucus of the Republican members of both houses, at which it was unanimously resolved that the proposed bill should be defeated, and Messrs. Edmunds, Frye, and Robeson were appointed a committee to prepare a substitute to be offered.

The Senate had a long discussion, on the 6th inst., of the proposition to authorize the Committee on Privileges and Elections to take testimony showing that Senator Kellogg obtained his seat by bribery, but no decision was reached in the matter. The bill to prevent the use of troops at the polls was reported, with amendments, from the Judiciary Committee by Mr. McDonald. Mr. Beck also reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments, the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill.——In the House, Mr. Knott reported back, without amendment, the bill to prohibit military interference at elections. Mr. Robeson offered a substitute prohibiting the use of troops at elections except under the provisions of the constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. This was rejected—yeas, 90; nays, 121. The bill, as originally introduced by Mr. Ladd, was then passed by a strict party vote—yeas, 124; nays, 90, all the Greenbackers who voted (11) voted yea, those not voting being Barlow and Russell.

After a protracted debate, the Senate, on the 7th inst., passed by a strict party vote the resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, authorizing them to take testimony in the matter of the memorial of Spofford, contesting the seat of Kellogg, of Louisiana.——In the House, the bill relating to coinage and bullion certificates was discussed. Mr. Chalmers' resolution to appoint a committee to investigate his connection with the Fort Pillow massacre, was laid on the table. During the debate on the resolution a sharp personal colloquy occurred between Mr. Chalmers and Mr. Burrows, of Michigan. The latter, in the course of a speech, made some remarks not complimentary to Mr. Chalmers' conduct in the Fort Pillow affair. The latter arose and said that he regretted what Mr. Burrows had said, but he would remind him that his (Burrows') record in the war was not clean and unspotted. Mr. Burrows, advancing down the aisle, demanded to know what Mr. Chalmers meant. Chambers, amid much confusion, said that he had been told that Burrows had resigned because his superior officer thought he was not competent. This announcement was received with derisive laughter on the Republican side. Burrows said that the statement was infamously false, and this was the first time that he had ever heard it. Chalmers said that he did not believe the statement, and would withdraw it.

In the Senate, on the 8th, consideration was resumed of the House bill prohibiting military interference at elections, and Mr. Morgan advocated its passage.——The House discussed the bill to enforce the Eight Hour law and the Silver bill. The former was defeated by a vote of 103 nays to 52 yeas. No vote was reached on the Silver bill.

How the Farm Was Bought.

A young man was very anxious to secure a piece of property which was just then for sale on very advantageous terms. He went to confer with a friend of his, who was a banker, about the matter, and to inquire whether it would be prudent to borrow the requisite sum and pay it in regular installments. He thought he should be able to manage all but the first installment. He was advised to borrow from the bank a sum enough larger than he wished to raise to cover the first payment, lay it strictly aside, and then go ahead. "But," said his friend, "you must spend literally nothing. You must make a box and drop in it all the money you receive." The young man and his wife went bravely to work to follow his advice. If it was necessary to dine off a head of boiled cabbage and salt, they did so and never grumbled. Every payment was promptly met. The egg money, and the butter money, and the corn and wheat money—all went into the payment-box, and at the specified time the place was theirs. There was an invisible wealth about such hard-earned possessions that common observers knew nothing of. On the day of the last payment the young man presented himself before his friend with a smiling face and with the money in his hand. There were no rags to be seen, but his clothing was well covered with darns from head to foot. "You see I have followed your advice," he said, casting a glance over himself, "and my wife looks worse than I do. But I have earned the farm and now I know how to earn another."—Cincinnati Times.

Georgia Tea.

Wm. Hughes, Sr., of Johnson's Station, Liberty county, sent us a few days since a sample of tea grown and prepared on his farm. It was "drawn" in the usual way, and the result was a most delicious beverage. Those who want the unadulterated tea should try the Georgia article, and they will never after drink the indigo-colored medicated leaf, as prepared in China especially for the European and American markets.—Savannah (Ga.) News.

AS A man was passing a house in Portland, Me., a 2-year-old girl, who was playing in a second-story room, jumped out of the window and struck fairly on his head. The child fell to the pavement and was badly bruised, though not seriously hurt, and the man, except being half scared to death, was not much injured.

A GENTLEMAN was threatening to beat a dog which barked intolerably. "Why," exclaimed an Irishman, "would you beat the poor dumb animal for spakin' out?"

SOME SINGULAR OCCURRENCES.

A PARIS (Ky.) sow has adopted a young puppy as a son.

A FULL-GROWN man was kidnapped by a woman in Dayton, Ohio. He was an inmate of an insane asylum, however, and she got him by pretending that she was his wife, whereas she had been divorced.

MRS. JAMES H. RUSHING, when washing clothes at a lake near Palestine, Tex., fought a catamount that attacked her. When she was almost overpowered she drew it into the lake and drowned the ferocious brute.

FATHER VINYARD, a Catholic priest at South Bend, Ind., is the latest victim of the dangerous habit of sleeping with false teeth in the mouth. A gold plate with teeth slipped part way down his throat, and, as surgeons are unable to remove them, he must die.

BURGLARS broke into the house of a New York man. They entered through a back basement window and went to the closet for silverware. A handsome wedding cake attracted their attention, and they took that, whereupon a parrot which was in the room, and which the burglars had not observed, began to scream. The burglars were so alarmed that they fled from the place, leaving all their tools behind.

THERE is now living in Chesterfield county, Va., an old negro man about 60 years of age, who, during the war, lost all of his teeth by accident, and several years ago, to his amazement and wonder, and to the utter astonishment of all who knew him, a complete set grew out again, and is pronounced to be an improvement upon the former set. This, perhaps, is one of the most remarkable freaks of nature on record.

THE Madison (Wis.) Journal tells of a young man of Mazomanie who was so objectionable to the father of the girl that the father kicked him out in the road. Later in the day the Mazomanie youth found the cruel parent at work in a tanyard. He walked boldly in, addressed the tanners, stating the facts in the case, and pitched at the old man. After a terrible scuffle the cruel parent begged to be let up. "Will you take me for a son-in-law, then, dog-rot you?" inquired the youth. "Yes," said the old man, and the same evening the hero led forth his bride.

THE Middletown (N. Y.) Argus tells of a peculiar tramp who sought shelter in the lock-up of that village the other evening. He said his name was Merritt Ruddy, that he belonged to the shores of Lake Erie, and that he was tramping through the country in search of five different men who owed him each $1,000. He was a very devout tramp; just before retiring for the night praying for those persons who refused to give him shelter and food, and supplicating the Lord to forgive their hard-heartedness, and in the morning offered a prayer that the people with whom he might be thrown in contact during the day would open their hearts to his worthy entreaties.

TWO YOUNG men went into the woods near Aurora, Ill., to play a game of cards. As they were rival lovers and had not previously spoken to each other for months, it was conjectured the girl in dispute was the stake that they played for. The winner, however, was not permitted to gain the prize, for his opponent instantly shot him through the heart. An effort to settle rivalry by chance had a not less-sad result in Texas. The two suitors were convinced that the young woman would accept either if the other would let her alone, and they agreed to throw dice to decide which should give her up. The loser honestly endeavored to keep the compact, but the woman refused to be disposed of in that way, and wrote to him that she would marry no one else, and would not even see the winner. The latter would not believe that his competitor had tried to retire from the contest, and so murdered him.

JOHN BOONE, an employe of Gebhart's flour-mills, in Dayton, Ohio, was caught in the shafting of the machinery. His clothes became wrapped about the shafting so tightly that when he discovered the fact he could not extricate himself. He is a man weighing 200 pounds and of great strength. Throwing one arm around a beam near at hand, he endeavored to pull the shafting out of gear or tear himself from it. He succeeded in springing it from the sockets, but, on slacking up, it sprung back. Boone held the shafting in this position for fully fifteen minutes, when, obliged to give up from exhaustion, he was drawn upon the shaft, his clothes, fortunately, giving away. They were torn completely from his body. He succeeded in getting to a lower floor of the building, where he fell from sheer exhaustion, and was discovered shortly after by those who had heard his cries. He was placed under medical care, and his condition at present is regarded as critical.

Bites of Spiders.

Spiders belong to the same class as scorpions. The poison-bags of the former are connected with hook-shaped mandibles in the anterior portions of their bodies. The following are some of the most important varieties of spiders:

The bird-spider, of South America, with a body from two to two and a half inches long; the scorpion-spider, of Costa Rica; the Kirghees-spider, only about half an inch long, but having a very virulent poison; the katipo spider, of New Zealand; a spider found, and much feared, in the South of France and in Spain; the tarantula, of Italy, and the great American spider. The last is one of the largest. Except the back, the whole body and the feet are covered with long bushy hair.

The tarantula is specially famous for the prevalent notion that its bite causes delirium, during which the person bitten does nothing but laugh, dance, and skip about in all sorts of extravagant postures. The patient is said to be cured only by music. The whole statement is an imposition on travelers by peasants, who, for a few cents, let themselves be bitten, and counterfeit the rest.

The bite of most of these spiders causes speedy death in the smaller animals; that of Kirghees even in large animals, and sometimes in human beings, about one in twenty-five of the latter dying when bitten.

The best treatment for the bite of a poisonous spider is to apply cold compresses, ice, lead-water and ammonia; to withdraw the poison by a cupping-glass; to throw the patient into a sweat is desirable. This can be done by hot drinks.

Turkish Justice.

Three years ago a young Christian Maronite in Turkey killed a Mussulman in a hot-headed quarrel. After lying ever since in prison, the mother of the victim came forward last February and insisted on his being sentenced to death. What followed the Constantinople correspondent of the Philadelphia Press thus describes: "As the crime was proven according to local judicial forms, she obtained from Midhat Pasha, the Governor of Syria, a firman for the execution, and a day was fixed for the hanging. In vain the notables of all creeds and races, Mussulmans and Christians, appealed to the old woman to be merciful, for upon her word depended the life of the Maronite. They represented to her that if he did do the deed it might have been in self-defense; that at any rate his guilt was not perfectly clear; that he had already grievously suffered in body and mind by his imprisonment, and that the people of Beyrout did not want a capital execution in their midst. Neither the Turkish Ulemas, the Greek and Armenian Bishops or the Turkish officials could soften the obdurate heart of this cruel megara. 'I have the firman for his execution,' she said, 'and his fate is in my hands. I will not spare him.' In the night of Feb. 5, three hours after midnight, he was taken from his cell and led to the place of execution. An immense crowd of people gathered around the scaffold. There took place a scene of the most extraordinary kind. The woman was told by the executioner that the man's relatives were ready to pay her any sum in their power if she would, as custom authorized, allow him to go free upon the payment of blood money. She shrieked and foamed for vengeance. For an hour and more she refused to be merciful, notwithstanding the entreaties of the mass of men, women and children. In the meanwhile the young man stood on the gallows with the halter about his neck, trembling for his life. Finally, worn out by the prayers of the people, and tempted by the high figure to which the relatives of the Maronite had run up the bid for his life, she consented to accept 3,000 francs as blood money. The hangman let go his hold of his expected victim, and handed him over to his relatives, who carried him off amid the acclamations of the spectators."

Fruit Sirups.

A new industry in the United States is the production of fruit sirups. Its success has brought these sirups into competition with French manufactures, which have heretofore had the markets of the world. As they are better, they are preferred in the United States, and also in the West Indies and South America. The strawberry, raspberry, and other fruits of this country are not only indigenous to the soil, and therefore can be produced cheaper, but they possess a far richer flavor and are more juicy, giving them an advantage over the fruits which have to be cultivated by extraordinary efforts in countries to which they do not naturally belong. The trade in sirups in this hemisphere has hitherto amounted to millions of dollars, which amount has not only gone out of this country to foreign nations, but has also been taken away from the trade of the United States with those countries which by their near proximity would be supposed to have preferred commercial relations with North America rather than and other part of the world. The success of the experiment bids fair to bring to the United States a large trade, besides driving out of our markets another of those foreign products, the control of the sale of which has hitherto been held abroad.—Syracuse Journal.

American Deadheads at the Paris Exhibition.

Ex-Gov. McCormick, the Chief Commissioner from the United States to the Paris Exhibition, tells the Washington Post that the Yankees pleased the Europeans with American scales, watches, locomotives, anthracite coal and fine machinery. It appears, too, that our exhibit of deadheadism caused astonishment, for he says: "The officials were overwhelmed by crowds of Commissioners who came over and made demands for tickets and social privileges, and greatly puzzled the French officials, who could not imagine why they should be so numerous. The law provided for the appointment of twenty additional Commissioners. Then Honorary Commissioners were created, two from each State, appointed by the Governor and confirmed by the President. Then it was decided that each State and Territory might send as many as it pleased, and Governors made out blanks accordingly. Such a cloud of witnesses made confusion, which the French Government finally reduced to order by deciding that they would recognize only those appointed by the President."

Frenchy.

The Paris Figaro tells of Miss Cora, an American, who is known as "La Fiances des Lions," who "nurses her lions tenderly in sickness, and lately brought up a whelp by hand." Once, while the menagerie was traveling in Hungary, the troupe ran short of provisions, and the lions grew ravenous. At this juncture appeared a band of brigands with a discharged employe of the troupe. Miss Cora quickly surrendered her jewels, and then darted to the vans and opened the lions' cage. The sagacious creatures instantly recognized their proper dinners. An hour later they had "gotten outside" of two bandits, and, in the happy frame of mind which a full stomach generates, sat licking their mistress' hand.

THREE hard-worked and under-paid printers, John B. Jackson, William J. Heaney and Patrick O'Brien, of New York, clubbed together recently and invested $2 in a lottery ticket. They now jingle $5,000 apiece—having held the lucky ticket in the April drawing. About the first time on record that lightning ever struck a printer.

IN the National House of Representatives there are now 34 Johns, 30 Williams, 15 Jameses, 14 Thomases, 16 Georges and Josephs. There is a Moses, an Eli, an Elijah, a Reuben, a Levi, a Michael, a Gideon, a Hezekiah, a Jephtha, a Jonathan, a Jonas, a Joshua, a Simeon, a Seth and an Ebenezer.

AUNT MILLEY WILLIAMS lives at Eason's Cross Roads, near Gatesville, N. C. Nobody thought that Milley was a miser. The other day her cabin was burned to the ground. During the fire she cried aloud for the neighbors to save her old chest under the bed. When the cabin had cooled off somewhat the neighbors poked around to see what could have been in the chest. They raked up just nine pounds of gold and silver.

THE Rev. Dr. Todd was induced to believe while at the town of Brinkley, Ark., recently, that certain roughs had plotted to assassinate him. He, therefore, slipped out of town by a back street as quickly as possible. He started through the Cache swamp, but lost his way and wandered for seven days and nights without food. He at last reached Duvall's Bluff, badly briar-torn and covered with echimosed spots for want of something to eat. The Brinkley people now say that the assassination story was intended to frighten Mr. Todd, whose timidity as well as worthy qualities were known.

His Ax.

"My dear," said Mr. Smiley, "can you locate the whereabouts of my ax?" His eldest looked up with beaming intelligence, and furnished the information that he "had planted it in the garden." "I like your Washington-like characteristics, my son; but why plant it?" "Well, you see, after Emily and I had our quarrel, mother said she wished we would 'bury the hatchet,' and, as we couldn't find one, we used the ax, because we always do what mother asks.

THE Massachusetts Legislature has passed an act permitting women to vote for members of school committees in the towns and cities of that State, but to become a voter it will be necessary for the women to go through such regular forms of registration as may be required for men, and to pay a poll-tax, which in Massachusetts is $2 per annum.

FREE AND FAIR ELECTIONS.

Able and Candid Speech of Senator David Davis.

Senator Garland on the Charge of "Coercion."

Speech of Judge Davis.

Mr. President, the caucus is an important factor in American politics, and both the great parties of the country employ its agency. This is done on the theory that party action is most easily perfected by this method. I do not complain of the mode adopted to reach results, but, as I have been for many years viewing public affairs from an independent standpoint, it does not help me to decide any question that may come before the Senate. Although usually preferring to give a silent vote, I cannot suffer this measure to be passed on without saying something on the subject.

The heat that has been manifested on the occasion of this debate has surprised me, if anything can surprise me in politics. A stranger unaccustomed to our modes of debate would suppose that the Union was in danger, and that the old questions, passions, prejudices and purposes which it had been thought were laid aside forever were again revived. And this, too, fourteen years after the Rebellion was conquered, and when there is no complaint from any quarter that the Federal compact presses too hard upon one section at the expense of another, and when the Federal Government is obeyed throughout the entire South.

There does not seem to be the least ground for the excitement and bitterness that have characterized the discussions in Congress at this session, and I should be amazed were it not that the records of all parties prove that majorities invariably commit legislative wrongs and minorities invariably protest against them. If it be true as charged that the success of one of the great parties of the country means revolution and ruin to constitutional liberty, of what value would be the securities of the Government, or indeed any other species of property? In the nature of things, if a revolution was impending or there was any danger apprehended to free government or popular liberty, the Government would not be able to sell bonds at 4 per cent. interest, nor the stock market in New York maintain its present high rate.

This charge, Mr. President, is mere fiction and has no foundation to rest on, but it produces infinite mischief and tends to demoralize the country and every material interest in it; alarms the thoughtless and timid, unsettles business and values, and produces a state of unrest in every community. It may succeed in winning elections, but it cannot restore prosperity. That great object can never be accomplished through a continuance of sectional strife and the violence that accompanies it, nor do I believe the people are in the mood for this kind of politics. They have had more than five years of harsh experience and they want to find some mode of relief from their present sufferings and impoverished condition. And they will honor the statesman who contributes to the stock of knowledge on this subject rather than the political leader who will not let the past alone.

I have no personal concern, Mr. President, in the rise and fall of parties, but I am deeply solicitous that the affairs of Government shall be so administered that labor seeking employment can obtain it; that all industrial pursuits will be suitably rewarded, and that heart be given to the people, North and South, to work out of their present embarrassments. We are one people, of the same blood and with the same destiny, and unity of feeling is essential to lift us out of the mire and to help us on the road to prosperity.

The different parts of our common country are so intimately connected in trade and commerce that, as a general rule, whatever injuriously affects one part has a corresponding effect on the other, and whatever benefits the one benefits the other.

It is, Mr. President, in my judgment, the imperative duty of the hour, instead of turning the attention of the people back into history with its animosities, to direct it to the troubled business interests of the country and the way to relieve them.

With the past buried and discussions on living issues, the people would soon regain the confidence which is essential in any plan for relieving the present hard times. It may be that such a course would affect the fortunes of parties—for both parties in Congress on any question of practical legislation fall to pieces—but it would have the most beneficial effect upon the fortunes of the country.

Without intending to reflect upon the patriotism of either party, it does appear to me that the speeches on the pending bill do not represent the wishes or opinions of the masses of the people of either section. Experience has taught them that legitimate business principles which lead to wealth and social happiness require a cessation from agitation on past subjects, and that sound policy dictates the cultivation of peace and good will between the sections. The country, Mr. President, cannot be prosperous so long as the old conflict between the North and South is used at each recurring Presidential election as an instrumentality of party success, and the statesman who shall rise equal to the occasion and put it at rest will receive the gratitude of a suffering people.

The bill before us is for the support of the army for the ensuing fiscal year. It is attacked because the sixth section alters two provisions of the Revised Statutes. Section 2,002 of these statutes reads as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls."

And section 5,528 is in these words:

"Every officer of the army or navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at any place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

These sections, though widely separated in the Revised Statutes, are parts of a general law passed on the 25th of February, 1865, "to prevent officers of the army and navy and other persons engaged in the service from interfering in elections in the States." (Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 437.)

The first section denounced the use of troops at elections except in two specified cases, and the second section provided the penalties for disobedience. The two excepted cases are when the troops were necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep peace at the polls. The sixth section of the Appropriation bill proposes to strike from both sections the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," and nothing more, so that the army cannot be used hereafter at elections for any purpose. As an abstract principle can there be any objection to this? Ought the army to be used at the polls when there has been profound peace for more than a decade? Does anyone believe that such a law would ever have received the approval of the American Congress if it had been brought forward in a time of peace? It was passed when a formidable civil war was in progress, taxing to the utmost the resources of the country.

In the opinion of the patriots of that day the state of feeling in certain parts of the country was of such a character as to endanger peaceful elections while the war lasted, unless a military force was kept in readiness for any outbreak of popular commotion. This was the conviction that prompted the legislation, but I venture to say no one of the eminent men who voted for it intended or expected that it would remain a part of the permanent law of the land. They were too well read in the lessons of history and the traditions of the Anglo-Saxon race to believe that a free people would tolerate—except on great emergencies like a war waged for the maintenance of the Union—the interference of the military in civic concerns. And they were men of principle and did not wish it to be otherwise.

It is no new thing in time of peace to repeal a law passed in time of war. Indeed, no wise statesman will hesitate to do it if the law be unsuitable to the changed condition of things. It is a part of the very nature of every man of our race to rebel against anything which interferes with the freedom of elections, and the days of the republic are numbered if the people ever consent to place the ballot-box under the protection of the bayonet.

But, Mr. President, this consent will never be obtained until they have forgotten the principles of constitutional liberty and the precedents set by the Commons of England. These precedents I refrain from referring to at length, but the preamble to an act passed in the time of George II. (1735) forbidding the presence of troops at elections is so appropriate that I beg leave to read it:

"Whereas by the ancient common law of this land all elections ought to be free; and whereas by an act passed in the third year of the reign of King Edward I., of famous memory, it is commanded, upon great forfeiture, that no man, by force of arms, nor by malice or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election; and forasmuch as the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament is of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the rights and liberties of this kingdom; and whereas it has been the usage and practice to cause any regiment, troop or company, or any number of soldiers which hath been quartered in any city, borough, town, or place where any election of members to serve in Parliament hath been appointed to be made, to remove and continue out of the same during the time of such election, except in such particular cases as are hereinafter specified."—Pickering's Statutes, volume 16.

And the "History of Parliament" contains this incident:

"The military having been called in to quell an alleged riot at Westminster election in 1741, it was resolved Dec. 22 'that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom.' The persons concerned in this, having been ordered to attend the House, received, on their knees, a very severe reprimand from the Speaker."—Parliament History, IX., 326.

Can it be possible that a principle of common law—the right of the people to have an election free from the presence of troops—so dear to Englishmen 100 years ago is not equally dear to their descendants at the present day?

Mr. President, it will require some one now living to write accurately the history of these times, for the future historian will be slow to believe that there was any basis on which to rest such an inquiry in the Congress of the United States during the latter part of the nineteenth century. Why, then, should not the law of 1865 be altered in the manner proposed by this bill?

It is said that Mr. Lincoln signed it, and the inference is that it would reflect on his memory to change it. To say the least, this is a pretty strong presumption from such a predicate. No man loved Mr. Lincoln better or honors his memory more than I do, nor had any one greater opportunities to learn the constitution of his mind and character and his habits of thought. He was large-hearted, wiser than those associated with him, full of sympathy for struggling humanity, without malice, with charity for erring man, loving his whole country with a deep devotion, and intensely anxious to save it. Believing as I do that he was raised up by Providence for the great crisis of the war of the Rebellion, I have equal belief, had he lived, we would have been spared much of the strife of these latter days, and that we now would be on the high road to prosperity. Such a man, hating all forms of oppression, and deeply imbued with the principle that induced the men of 1776 to resist the stamp tax, would never have willingly intrusted power to any one, unless war was flagrant, to send troops to oversee an election.

Why, then, I repeat, should not the proposed measure pass? There is no rebellion, nor any threatened, nor any domestic uproar anywhere. The Union is cemented by the blood that was shed in defense of its integrity; the laws are obeyed North and South, East and West, and our only real differences relate to the administration of the internal affairs of the Government. By the constitution of the human mind, there will of necessity be diverse opinions among the people on the best way to manage their internal affairs, and Congress meets periodically to legislate for the people and to represent their views on the questions dividing them. But surely these differences, be they great or small, afford no justification for a departure from any of the principles that underlie republican government. If they do, the charter of our liberties will be soon frittered away.

The charge that this is "revolutionary" legislation has no force. It might be called a partisan device. Congress has power under the constitution to raise and equip armies, and the House of Representatives holds the purse strings.

In the pending Army bill, nothing is proposed but to strike out a single clause forbidding the presence of troops at the polls. In no respect is the authority of the President to answer a call to repel invasion, or to suppress insurrection, in any way abridged. The amendment is germane to the bill, and is simply a condition as to the use of the army, which the people's representatives had a perfect right to impose. It is not in any proper sense general legislation, and, if it was, the statute books are full of precedents that the friends of the present measure might cite against their opponents.

Whether the clause in question ought to be repealed is a fair subject for discussion, but the form of presenting it is not liable to just criticism. Personally, I should have preferred to vote on the proposition as an independent bill, because the practice of both parties of legislating on appropriation bills is more to be honored in the breach than in the observance. If this course had been pursued it is probable the whole debate would have been less acrimonious, and the excitement which has followed it could never have been worked up to so high a pitch.

It has been alleged that there has been an attempt to coerce the Executive in this bill. Certainly none appears on the surface, and he is left entirely free to exercise his own judgment if it should be sent to him in the present or in a modified form. To assume that he will approve, or will veto it, or to introduce him in any way into this debate, is a departure from wise usage. The President's sphere of action is defined by the constitution, and any attempt to influence legislation by suggestions of what he may or may not do is an obtrusion deserving rebuke.

It will be time enough to criticise the act of the President when he shall have exercised his constitutional right, and any discussion of his supposed course before then is wholly out of place in this body. Let us hope, Mr. President, when this bill has passed from our hands that the angry debate which has attended it will operate as electricity does in purifying the atmosphere, and that we will all come together better disposed to give to the country what has been given to party, in a united effort to provide relief for the prevailing distress in every pursuit of life.

Extract from the Speech of Senator Garland, of Arkansas.

The power of the House of Representatives to originate money bills and the power of Congress to raise and support armies are unlimited except as to the duration of the appropriation. They are judges of how it shall be done and what disposition shall be made of it; and I will court the investigation of gentlemen, to this proposition; can they find an army appropriation bill in which some provision providing how the army shall be commanded, where it shall be, and when it shall go, is not to be found?

The appropriations for building bridges, for erecting public buildings and so on, contain provisions of that character. For symmetry and propriety of legislation, I admit with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Bayard] that it is not proper and right in itself, but nothing short of a constitutional amendment can ever get it out of our system of legislation. There is one statute of this sort that I shall be pardoned for referring to, because my memory loves fondly to linger upon it. That is to be found in sixteenth Statutes at Large, page 235. In the General Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill, there I find the following:

For payment of judgments which may be rendered by the court in favor of claimants, $100,000: Provided.

Here comes a long proviso—I shall not read it all, but it is what is known as the celebrated Drake amendment—in which the whole law and the whole system of pardons by the President was attempted to be reversed and the doctrine lying at the bottom of it turned back on the country. For example, instead of the pardon when it was produced in the Court of Claims showing that the man was loyal, it was to be taken as evidence that he was disloyal, and the Supreme Court was denied jurisdiction of a case which had been dismissed on a plea of that sort. But the safety-valve of the Government had not yet been expelled from the country, and, when Klein's case (reported in 13 Wallace) went to the Supreme Court, they said to these gentlemen, "Stand aside, the Supreme Court has already said in a case—in 4 Wallace—that the pardon was as broad as the offense, and, necessarily, the grace must be as broad as the sin, and when the man is pardoned he is restored as though he never committed the offense." I myself received from Andrew Johnson a pardon as big as a Dutch blanket. I pleaded that in the Supreme Court, and they announced the doctrine there that I was fully as good a man, if not somewhat better, than I was before I committed treason; and, in the case of Klein (in 13 Wallace), the Supreme Court said this celebrated Drake amendment could not stand; it was unconstitutional—I will not use the word revolutionary, but that came as near being a revolution by legislation as any I have been able to find on the statute-book—it subverted the whole doctrine of pardons and the power of the President to grant them and the operation of a pardon when granted, and, therefore, this act must stand as if it never had been passed.

It was decided in England and followed in this country on the question of pardon, that, after a man had received his pardon, an action of slander would lie against a person for accusing him of committing the offense of which he was pardoned. That doctrine has been repealed here in this country. Now they reverse the engine completely, and say that when he exhibits his pardon it is proof that he is disloyal. The Court of Claims dismissed Klein on that, and he appealed to the Supreme Court. That is a statute which it would be well for people to remember and not forget. It is one of these unfortunate things that occur in time of high partisan feeling, but which I for one hope has passed away never to return, the last semblance of which being the matter we now have in hand.

I will not say all these acts were passed with a view to coercive purposes, but all these acts tended to this—and let the student of the philosophy of the history of our Government and its nature think of that a moment—tended to make what I believe Mr. Thaddeus Stevens claimed openly in the other House, that this was a Congressional Government as distinguished from a constitutional Government; that Congress was the Government of this country as Parliament was of England. But soon after the passage of these acts, of course not for the purpose of coercing Andrew Johnson—nobody would say that—failing to secure what they thought was in hand through Congress, Cæsar came, and with the coming of Cæsar they supposed all things else would come that it was desirable should come, and it was believed that through the President, Gen. Grant, all these things could be accomplished with or without legislation of this character, notwithstanding the grand letter he had written in 1866 when he was General-in-Chief of the Army. If such statutes as this can find themselves on an appropriation bill, let no man, woman or child in this country complain of that mode of proceeding so that we take care that there shall not be unconstitutional provisions incorporated.

But further, when we met in December under the law, our term was limited to the 4th of March. In the great clash of business requiring the passage of bills and the pressure for investigating different measures, these provisions of the statute which the country demands shall be repealed had little or no opportunity for consideration in separate bills. They would have perished either in one house or the other, or between the two, as it turned out they did at the last hours of the session. Now mark. Immediately upon that the Congress is called together, for what purpose? For the purpose of considering appropriation bills alone. How else are you to get off these provisions that, if I am not mistaken, the country is loudly clamoring for the repeal of? The President's message is not longer than the blade of an ordinary penknife, calling us together. He calls us for two appropriation bills. He says virtually, "consider them, and go home." We propose to consider them with all other measures necessary to protect the rights of citizens in this country.

The Senator from Maine the other day undertook to frighten us by telling us this fine Capitol would have to go down and not be kept up, and our commerce would be suspended, and our Supreme Court and other courts. That there may be no misunderstanding on that proposition, so far as I am concerned, I have to say that I would see this building crumble and given up to the owls and bats and rats, and every ship of ours in its moorings, and the Supreme Court and all the balance of them suspended before I would see, without attempting to protect them, the rights of the humblest citizen shackled by legislation of Congress, or the humblest citizen of this country deprived of his rights in any way. The twelve Cæsars, when they punished men for what they thought, boasted of the splendor and grandeur of their great city, when their legions were trampling their citizens under foot as so many leaves in the forest. They had their blazing avenues; they had their grand domes and their magnificent palaces; but the personal liberty of the citizen was gone. Give me that first, and I will then help build your fine temples and your commerce and all that. The boast of the English Government is that its humblest citizen will receive its protection, if it be at the mouth of their cannon, whether he is on their own soil or on foreign distant soil, and that is the secret of the strength and power of that Government to-day. I concur with the eloquent words of the Senator from Indiana, that the people are not going to stand upon the order in which these vicious measures shall be taken from the statute book; they want them off. We have asked to have them taken off, and if we cannot get them out of the way by any other means than through appropriation bills, bring on your appropriation bill and let us have them there.

There is no coercion in this; I mean no coercion to the President. He is as independent in his sphere as we are in ours; and we are as independent in ours as he is. Did we when we passed the Chinese bill send over to him to know whether he would veto it or not? Did we when we passed the Silver bill? Are we reduced to this that we must send to him as it were in the old code of practice a "letter missive," requesting him to hold up his hand? Let him do his duty and let us do our duty, and then all will go on well. I have no fault to find with these gentlemen if they conscientiously believe this, but I repudiate the idea that any person on this side wants to coerce the President. No intimation of that character has been given out. We heard floating around us rumors that he would veto the Chinese bill, and it fell with his veto. We heard then as now that he would veto the Silver bill; which he did, and it was passed almost before his veto was dry on the table. With a general sentiment here at this session, evidenced by the resolution introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds], that we should consider no general legislation during the session, how are we to approach and get to this second bill of rights for the American citizen except through the medium of the appropriation bills? If the Senators on the other side give us a plan, I am perfectly willing to adopt it.

So, Mr. President, this measure in itself is unjust, and it should go out of the statute-book. That I do not believe any man can doubt. Is it proper that the repeal should be in an appropriation bill? It is supported by precedent so long back that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; and, if it was not, there is no other means to get at it but through an appropriation bill.

I have discussed the question as it suggested itself to me, and I have done it in good feeling to all. I believe yet, notwithstanding the threat of coercion and revolution and all that, the country will still live. Somehow or other it manages to get along and live. I believe yet a bright destiny is before us, but that destiny is best secured by adhering to the constitution, never going away from it; and, adhering to that, I believe that yet, like the hand on the sun-dial, we shall count only the hours that are bright.

A Queer Kind of Milk.

There is a cow-tree in Venezuela, her milk of which is very much like cows' milk or cream. They go each morning to the forest, make some deep cuts in the trees, and in less than two hours their vessels are full. They use it to drink and to mix with tapioca and maize. The tree is from forty-five feet to sixty in height, and has long alternate leaves. The Government of Venezuela sent to the Paris Exposition several bottles of this milk, which has been analyzed by prominent scientific men. It contains sugar, caseine and other things found in cow's milk, but is richer and much more nutritious.

POSTAL AFFAIRS.

Newspapers and Second-Class Matter.

Postmaster Palmer, of Chicago, has compiled the following regulations respecting newspapers and second-class mail matter from official documents received at his office. Publishers and the public generally will find them of unusual interest:

WHAT IS SECOND-CLASS MATTER?

Mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, and are within the conditions below:

1. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

2. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

3. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial bindings, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

4. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers. Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

"A known office of publication" is a public office for the transaction of the business of the periodical, where orders may be received for subscriptions and advertising during the usual business hours. Publications issued without disclosing the office of publication must not be forwarded unless prepaid at the rate of third-class matter.

"Regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes" are defined to be:

1. Those owned and controlled by one or several business concerns, and conducted for the advancement of the business or trade of those who own them.

2. Those which, having no genuine or paid-up subscriptions, insert advertisements free, on condition that the advertiser will pay full price for any number of papers which are sent to persons whose names are given to the publisher.

3. Those which do advertising only, and whose columns are filled with long editorial puffs of firms or individuals who buy a certain number of copies for distribution.

4. Pamphlets containing market quotations and the business cards of various business houses opposite the pages containing such quotations.

5. Publications largely devoted to the particular trade or profession of those editors or publishers whose editorials, correspondence and the burden of whose information relates to that trade or profession, and designed to subserve the business interest of those proprietors by advertising or calling attention to the nature of such business.

POSTAGE ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Publications of the second class, when sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents, shall be entitled to transmission through the mails at 2 cents a pound or fraction thereof.

Sample copies of publications of the second class, which are entitled to transmission through the mails at 2 cents a pound, are defined to be copies sent to persons not subscribers for the purpose of inducing them either to subscribe for or to advertise in the publication, or to agents, or to persons desiring to become agents, or whom the publisher may wish to induce to act as agents, to be used by them in procuring subscriptions and advertising. Any number of copies of any number of different editions of a second-class publication may be sent at any one time as sample copies. The primary design of a publisher in sending out sample copies is to increase the subscription list and advertising patronage of his publication, and the law permits him to send such copies at the most favored rates in the expectation that the correspondence resulting therefrom, and the increased circulation of the publication to regular subscribers will augment the postal revenues. Publishers will not be permitted, however, to use the exceptional advantages given to them by the law so as to defraud the Postal Department by mailing as sample copies extra numbers of their publications ordered by advertisers, or by campaign committees, or by other persons, to be sent to specified addresses, and apparently intended, from the nature of the contents or of marked portions thereof, to serve the business, political or personal interests of the person or persons ordering the same. Such copies are third-class matter, and must be prepaid by stamps at the rate of 1 cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof.

"Going A-Fishing."

The man who invented the fish-hook will some day have a monument. It will be a granite column 500 feet high, built by the boys alone. A boy might possibly get along with marbles, tops, stilts, balls, and kites, yet he would feel that there was an aching void somewhere. A kite does well enough as long as it will outsail all other kites and the string doesn't break, and a pair of stilts are good property until after the first fall; but for real solid pleasure the fish-hook can never be beaten. A boy will always expect more and get less from it than anything else invented, but he never gets too discouraged to try again.

The Smith boy was observed trying his luck yesterday in a pond on a vacant lot on Alfred street. As far back as last December his mother promised him half a day out of school as soon as the fish began to bite, and yesterday was the glorious day. Where there's water there ought to be fish, according to every boy's reckoning, and this youth "surrounded" that wee little pond-hole with its barrel of muddy water with just as much enthusiasm as a man would throw a line into Lake St. Clair. He had ham, sweetcake, potato, dried beef, and boiled egg for bait, and when he had spit on the bait and cast in his hook all the Seth Greens ever born couldn't have convinced him that he would fail of at least one good big bite. For two long hours he fished for sturgeon, and pickerel, and pike, changing the bait now and then and never forgetting to spit on it, and as he hauled up for the last time he would simply admit that it wasn't just the right sort of day to go fishing. If he had had a little one to carry home his triumph would have been more complete, but yet his eyes were like diamonds as he met two boys on the corner and called out:

"Say! I've stayed out of school a whole half-day and been a-fishing! I didn't catch any fish, 'cos they were all on their nests, but you ought to have seen the big frog which tumbled off a stone!"—Detroit Free Press.

The Return from Leadville.

"Why is it," asked a correspondent, "that, if Leadville is as bad a place as you describe it, we never see any of the people who go there come back?" Oh, well, that is easily enough explained. When a young man sets out for Leadville, he arrays himself conspicuously for a day or two prior to his departure, then he has the fact of his going and the train he will take announced in the village paper, and, at the appointed time, he goes rattling down to the depot in an open carriage two hours before train time, and swaggers up and down the platform while he waits, and, as the train goes off, he leaps out of the window and yells a personal good-by to everybody on the platform. But, when he comes back, he times his return so as to strike his native town by a back road, after dark, then he sneaks home through the alleys, climbs over the back fence, taps at the kitchen window and begs, under his breath, to be let in; and, when he gets in, he stays in bed three or four days, while his new clothes are being made and the doctor is trying to count the blisters on his feet. Oh, it's easy to explain why we never see them come back; but they do come back all the same.—[illegible]

The Burmese Butchery.

A letter from Rangoon, India, gives the following particulars of the horrible massacre of the Burmese Princes and their relatives:

"The King's fears continued to gain on him as one after another of the Princes pined away and died in the frightful underground prisons, loathsome with filth never removed since these dens were constructed, years ago. Fears of British intervention prevented him from putting them to death months ago. Suddenly news of the disaster in Zululand reached Mandalay. That apparently decided him, and the work of cold-blooded butchery began, which will hardly find a parallel in history. At first the massacre was carried on according to the old Burmese custom. The victims were led out of their cells in twos and brought to the King, and disposed of in the ordinary Buddhist fashion. The head of the victim was tied down to his ankles and a blow on the back of the neck from a heavy club put him out of pain. But this soon proved too mild a spectacle for the fiendish mind of the King. Thoughar, the Prince whose insolent bearing English visitors to Mandalay will remember, on being brought to do reverence to his young brother—the King is past 21 years—professed an utter scorn for him, and was flogged to death. The late King's oldest son, the Truenten Meyaha Prince, who looked upon all foreigners as so much dirt under his feet, turned craven and was taunted and driven to madness before receiving the blow which only half-stunned him, when his writhing body was thrown into the gigantic trench dug to receive the victims. The massacre was carried on in a leisurely fashion extending over several days, fiendish ingenuity being taxed to the utmost to devise fresh horrors. Maungoke, the Governor of Rangoon, when it was captured by the British in 1856, had his nose and mouth filled with powder. A light was applied, and he was then flung into the trench to be stifled by bodies of succeeding victims. The daughter of Nyaung Yan, a young girl of 16, was handed over to eight soldiers of the Royal Guard to be pitched insensible into the grave when they had gratified their lust. The wife of one Prince, far advanced in pregnancy, was ripped up and the husband brought to see his wife and child before he died. After some days of this sort of thing the executioners got weary and hurried through their task. Little children were put in blankets and swung against the palace walls. Women were battered over the heads as taking less trouble than tying them up so as to get a blow on the neck. Altogether about ninety persons are believed to have been put to death in this way."

The Height at Which Birds Fly.

It is much to be desired that something positive were known as to the height at which it may be possible for birds to perform their passages, but on this point we have—so far as I am aware—little information. The experiments made by Mr. Glaisher on the six pigeons taken up in his celebrated balloon ascent, Sept. 5, 1862—Rep. Brit. Ass., 1862, page 385—unfortunately admit of no definite deductions. One pigeon thrown out at the height of three miles "extended its wings and dropped as a piece of paper." A second at four miles "flew vigorously round and round, apparently taking a dip each time." A third between four and five miles "fell downward as a stone." A fourth at four miles, in the descent, "flew in a circle," and then alighted on the balloon. The two remaining pigeons were brought down, and one was found to be dead. Perhaps a little more "practice," or "experience" was wanted, but, at any rate, the results do not seem to favor the notion that birds can fly comfortably at those heights. Nor is this surprising, considering the well-known effects of the rarification of the air at great heights. I, of course, pretend to no special knowledge of this subject, but Mr. S. W. L. Glaisher, F. R. S., kindly informs me that, at an elevation of five miles, the density of the air is about 1-2.7 of what is on the earth's surface, at an elevation of seven miles about 1-4.1, and of ten miles about 1-7.5. I know not whether experiments have been made to test the endurance of a bird's life under such a condition as the last, but it could, of course, be easily produced under an air-pump. It would not be so easy to test the power of sight under the same condition. It is only obvious that the power would be very greatly diminished, and I should be glad to learn the results of any investigation of this kind. Physicists and physiologists might here give ornithologists great help.—Nature.

Catching Birds With a Fish-Hook.

Old man Lymus Paul, a colored man, living in the lower part of the county, went fishing the other day and set a "trot" line and left the pond. On his return, instead of fish he had caught a wild duck and an owl. The duck caught the roach with which the hook was baited and was held fast. The owl attempted to catch the duck, and, striking at him, became entangled in the line and was also fastened. This can be vouched for as true. We have often heard of killing two birds with one stone, but never knew two to be caught with one hook before.—Roanoke (Va.) News.

Mrs Freeman, mother of little Edith Freeman, who was stabbed to the heart by her father, in the belief that it was a sacrifice required by God, is dying of grief and starvation. She concurred in her husband's belief at the time, but her religious faith has since been overshadowed by remorse, and she is thereby rendered nearly frantic. The case is no less peculiar than it is sad, and it certainly has no parallel. Freeman, the father, still believes that the child will be resurrected.

We are not surprised to learn that the commissioner of Internal Revenue, at Washington, has decided that the ten dollar refunding certificates which have been on sale at post-offices throughout the country are taxable. The Commissioner holds that the certificates, though convertible into bonds, are not, in the sight of the law, bonds. Under this decision the certificates are not as desirable as was at first supposed, unless converted into government bonds at once. Persons who do not hold the required amout to make the transfer, had better secure greenbacks, for they are more profitable, and can be used at any time.

The socialists and trades unions of Chicago, it is reported, have organized a general strike to begin July 5th. The first demand will be the adoption of the eight hour system. Should they gain that point they will at once demand an increase of wages. If there is any truth in the report, we may expect serious trouble, and perhaps bloodshedding, as the failure of the last strike no doubt learned the leaders of the movement that greater preparations must be made in order to have any show of success. We hope there is no ground for alarm, it however, there is any arrangement for a strike, it will be general, and the entire country will be effected by it.

The trial in the case of the State vs. George Hazzard, charged with highway robbery, came to a close yesterday morning, by a verdict of acquittal for the defendant. The argument of the counsel being finished, Judge Chase instructed the jury that there was not a shadow of a case against the defendant, and that they should return a verdict accordingly. This they did without leaving their seats. This verdict acquits Hazzard from all charges against him in this locality, and he now proposes to carry the war into Africa, as it were, by pushing the case against his prosecutors. To this end, an attempt will be made before the present grand jury to have those persons who attempted to steal him off to Auburn, nearly a year ago, indicted for abduction.—Logansport Journal.

Last week's Steuben Republican publishes a lengthy extract from a letter to the Chicago Times, written by Col. P. Donan, of Arkansas. In a preamble to the article the Republican says, amongst other things, that Donan, while "editing a rebel anti-reconstruction paper at St. Joseph, Mo., was not at all particular what he said about rival editors, but if one of them dared to say a word against him, he immediately prepared for war and sent forth his challenge to mortal combat;" and still further it says that "he traveled quite extensively in the 'sunny south' and always carried a small arsenal with him." Most of this, to our personal knowledge, is absolutely false, and our neighbor across the line has prematurely discharged his little battery. Until a few months ago, and for nearly two years prior to that, we have lived in the town where Col. Donan is now editing a democratic paper,—the Bentonville (Ark.) Advance,—most of which time we were associated with him as an employe of that office. While Col. Donan is a man of strong personal convictions, free to express himself on all questions, social or political, he is every inch an intelligent, upright, honorable gentleman, ever endeavoring to assert the rights and privileges of the land he loves and lives in, but equally willing to acknowledge its failings. If the "sunny south" had a few men at its helm who were imbued with some of the characteristics of Col. P. Donan, of Arkansas, her chances for harboring in a haven of entire redemption would be materially augmented.

Conspiracy and despotism have a firm hold upon traitorous leaders of the republican party. As a consequence the suspicions of republican mendacity, hypocrisy and treachery are justified, and with Hayes' last veto comes the irrevocable fact that the republican party has fully determined in favor of despotism. The liberties of the people are to be surrendered, the fundamental principles of the government to be sacrificed and "one man power" instituted instead. An exchange truthfully says that "the democratic party is now called upon with an emphasis, such as has not been known in the country for a century, to stand firmly by its policy. It is right, absolutely and immutably right. If there be a "providence that shapes the ends," of politics "rough hew them how we will," then the democratic party is providentially in power in congress to map out the policy upon which it is now standing, and for which it is contending. It has truth and tradition, justice and right, constitution and conscience on its side. Animated by the purest patriotism, it has only to stand firm to reap in due time a victory as grand as that which crowned the steady nerves, the iron will and lofty purposes of Washington and his compatriots. To yield an inch, to abandon any advanced position, is to cover a glorious record with ineffaceable ignominy. Without troops at the polls the republican party is a dead cock in the pit; a tallow candle flickering its last flicker; a dog without a bark; a tom cat with the elevation out of its back; a grasshopper, minus the hop."

Another Nut for Logan to Crack.

Congressman Lowe recently charged John A. Logan, republican U. S. Senator from Illinois, with having recruited several companies for the Confederate army at the commencement of the civil war, the charge led to a controversy, and finally Lowe challenged Logan to fight a duel, which challenge the latter refused to accept, and all prospects of a "settlement" on the point between these two belligerents seems to be at a stand still for the present. In the meantime there comes something very like tangible, straight-forward evidence, which looks as if Logan was guilty. It is as follows:

I, John G. Wheatly, a resident of the city and county aforesaid, do solemnly swear that on the 28th day of May, 1861 I went from Williamson county, Illinois, to join R. H. Cunningham, Company G of the Fifteenth Regiment Tennessee volunteers; that Major General John A. Logan, who then represented the district in congress, was the chief person who raised said army and persuaded me to join the same; that said Logan accompanied us (about 70 in number) in the night, part of the way from Williamson county to Paducah, the place designated for us to cross the river. We crossed at Paducah, according to John A. Logan's instructions, to evade Union troops, which, he stated, were stationed at Cairo.

When Logan left he agreed to meet us as soon as possible, and assigned as a reason for not accompanying us then that he wanted to settle up his affairs at home and raise more troops. Logan, when he left, promised faithfully to join us soon and command our regiment in the Confederate service, but the next time we met him was at Belmont, in the Federal service, and in the fight Captain Cunningham and I chased him so closely that he was compelled to dismount. We succeeded in capturing his horse and delivered it to General Pillow of the Confederate army.

I served in the confederate army from the above date until July 20 1862, in Captain Cunningham's company, and was honorably discharged at Tupelo, Miss. My son R. L. Wheatly, Thomas Coder, Harry Hays, William Tinker, Jackson Brown, Jackson Love, Lering Ghent, Martin Williams and others, all except the first now residing, or when I last heard from them, in Marion, Williamson county, Illinois, were members of said company and will attest the truth of the statement.

JOHN G. WHEATLY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 30th day of September, 1868.

JOHN Q. HARMER.

Clerk of circuit court, Alexander county Illinois.

Another Veto.

On last Monday Hayes sent a message to the House of Representatives vetoing the bill to prohibit troops at the polls. In doing so he placed the republican party on record against free election in the north as well as the south. He acknowledges the justice of the claims made by the democrats in the following language: "Holding as I do, that any military interference whatever at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections, and sincerely desiring to concur with congress in all of its measures, it is with very great regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the bill before me is not only unnecessary to prevent such interference, but is a dangerous departure from long settled and important constitutional principles." Forced? was it force of judgment, or force of Chandler & Co? The verdict of the American people will be that it is NECESSARY "to prevent such interference," the views of the fraudulent President to the contrary notwithstanding. In discussing the veto, the Indianapolis Sentinel says:

"The most infamous portions of the message are those which seek to impress upon the country the brazen falsehood that Washington, Jefferson and Jackson favored armed interference with elections, and seeks to substantiate this idiotic drivel by reference to the 'whisky rebellion,' to 'nullification,' and to the late war. We are not disappointed in Hayes. We have at no time credited him with honesty, with statesmanship or a remote desire to do right. Considering the fact that the miscreant has quartered upon the federal treasury every vile wretch of any prominence, from John Sherman to the most abandoned vagabond that helped to swindle him into office, there has been at no time since he entered upon the duties of his stolen office, any reason for believing he possessed a grain of patriotism. A creature of fraud, he now seeks by the most detestable subterfuges to maintain the ascendency of his party by with-holding his signature from a bill which met with almost universal approval. It is the first straight-out declaration that bayonets are in future to be employed in aid of the republican party. It is a murderous blow aimed at state rights, freedom of elections and the liberties of the people. On this veto the republican party hopes to win the election in 1880. It is their last and only hope. They have faith in it as the assassin has faith in his knife, bludgeon or pistol. Every republican conspirator, made bold by former successes, has confidence in vicious and violent measures, and the whole brood are now chuckling over what they regard as the probable back-down of the democratic majority in congress. It is safe to say that if the republican party wins on Hayes' veto; if troops at the polls, and bayonets instead of ballots are to shape the destinies of this republic, now is as good a time as will ever come in all of the centuries to find it out. The democratic party has done its duty, and having done all that patriotism demands it has nothing else to do but to stand firm, and this it must do or submit to ignominious defeat."

The Okolona Howler.

Kenton, O., May 3.—People who wonder why the Okolona Southern States has so much circulation in the north, and why it is so extensively copied from by the republican papers, will probably be enlightened by a perusal of the following letter, which explains itself:

Office of the Southern States, Okolona Miss., April 30th, 1879.—Geo. J. S. Robinson: The papers have been sent agreeable to instructions.

The points are made red-hot this week, and all of them will hit hard. It is advisable to have them as extensively copied as possible. We will mark them for our northern exchanges.

Congressman Frye regards it a great success.

We will give them h—ll according to the extent of the circulation. The larger the subscription list the louder the thunder.

Yours, with respect,

WILL H. KERNAN.

Supreme Court—May 10.

Fort Wayne, Jackson and Saginaw Railroad company vs. Henry Husselman, DeKalb C. C. Affirmed.

Howk, C. J.—The only question in this case is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury in favor of the appellee. The appellee was the only witness in his own behalf. There were several witnesses in behalf of appellant. The jury, who saw and heard appellee testify evidently believed his evidence, as they had the right to do, for they returned a verdict in his favor. The court before whom and in whose hearing he testified certainly believed and confided in his evidence, for it refused, upon a proper motion made, to disturb the verdict of the jury upon the weight of sufficiency of the evidence. In such a case it is the duty of this court to affirm the judgment of the court below. (49 Ind., 568; 57 Ind., 115; Busk. Prac, 236, et seq.)

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. Sherar, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y. 6-eow 6-m.

Well Known.

As it is known that Dr. Price's Special Flavoring Extracts are not made up from chemical poisons, but natural flavors, delicate and grateful to the most cultivated palate, they are growing rapidly in popular favor. It is only necessary to try these flavors to be convinced that they are fine and pure.

Troy Township.

—Moving seems to be the order of the day.

The commissioners were through here viewing some ditches last Friday.

—David Esterline is building a new barn.

—Levert Williams has finished a new sheep barn this spring.

—The St. Joe. cheese factory commenced opperations May 1st.

—Daniel Weitz moved to Edgerton last week, where he intends to study for a profession.

—Troy is pretty well represented in teachers and young preachers, there being twelve of the former and six of the latter.

—Bill Casey has over a mile of county ditch to dig, all to be finished by the first of September.

—We understand that several persons are anxious to know who the Troy correspondent is. For the benefit of all such, we will state that he is a little boy 51 years old, who lives on the island in Wiley's tamarac. If any of you pass that way, you will always find the latch-string hanging out.

A Luxury.

The unique perfumes made by Dr. Price are indeed a luxury; their fragrance as sweet and exhilarating as a walk in a garden of flowers at evening close. Dr. Price's odors are truly as sweet and natural as flowers freshly gathered. Try his Floral Riches; it is a cologne water of delightful fragrance.

Mr. H. H. Stamets is bound to close out his entire stock, including millinery goods, within the next 60 days. In order to do so he is offering all goods at actual cost. Remember that his goods are new. By buying now you will secure bargains.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, swaddled in one of his sacks, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on —Boys' and youths' straw hats, all styles and prices, at Ensley & Co's.

—J. D. Williamson and T. F. Jordan, of Corunna, were in town yesterday.

—The saw and hammer of the carpenter make music (?) on the summer air.

—G. W. Weamer, of the Republican, went up to Angola Friday of last week.

—Great Christopher! wasn't it hot just before that refreshing dampness of Tuesday?

—The programme for the exercises on decoration day, will be published next week.

—Sam Pomert say he likes to shave dead men;—they never kick when the razor pulls.

—We call the attention of our readers to the full-page supplement accompanying this paper.

—Go to the boot up-side down and be "averaged up" for a family outfit of boots and shoes.

—Mr. Hosack Reed, auditor of Holmes county, Ohio, was in town on a visit last week.

—Strawberries are down to ten cents a box at Port Wayne; probably as many as two in a box.

—W. J. Austin & Co., at the boot up-side down still hold their trade in spite of all competition.

—Rev. R. S. Goodman of Kendallville, will preach in the Presbyterian church next Sabbath.

—People who marry for money realize when it is too late, that the golden glitter is all moonshine.

—New millinery goods received twice a week, at the new fancy store, east side of the public square.

—R. Elson terminated his excurt to Ohio last Tuesday, and now casts his shadow in Auburn as usual.

—The small boys use the new trough at the town pump for baptizing each other and washing their feet.

—Ladies' linen suits at N. Ensley & Co's, east of public square, cheaper than ever sold in the county.

—Remember that when Houston delivers ice, he washes it and places it in the refrigerator free of charge.

—O. Y. Ster and family have migrated northward, as they are considered n. g. during the summer months.

—Frost nearly every moning last week. May is losing her reputation as a well-behaved summer month.

—Treasurer Gonser, made his semi-annual settlement with the state treasurer at Indianapolis, this week.

—Don't forget the festival, for the benefit of the M. E. church, at Dr. Ford's room, Wednesday evening.

—Schaab, Beugnot & Co. will sell you a better carpet for less money than any other store in northern Indiana.

—F. E. Davenport says that the liver-pad will cure all the aches and ails that flesh is heir to—corns not excepted.

—It is easy to make money, but hard to save it, unless you buy your boots and shoes at the boot up-side down.

—Schaab, Beugnot & Co. sell the best and freshest groceries that can be had, and at prices low as the lowest.

—Of all the "booms" we have yet heard of, the "boom" at the boot up-side down is the boomest of 'em all.

—You will never meet with fishermen's luck, if you do your fishing in the big tub at Houston's meat market.

—T. H. Sprott left for the north last Tuesday, and will return some time between now and next year at this time.

—Austin's big up-side-down boot is having its picture taken, and a wood-cut will be made from the photograph.

—Business is rushing. It was currently reported on the streets to-day that there was a man in town yesterday.

—Circuit court will convene on the fourth Monday in this month, which may be better designated as the 26th of May.

—The great demand for advertising space in the COURIER compels us to issue another full-page supplement this week.

—Miss Alice McKay, daughter of our townsman, J. A. McKay, came up on the northern bound Saginaw train last Friday.

—T. C. Mays has returned from his eastern tour. Says he isn't doing anything but farming, just now, and don't want to.

—The Board of Commissioners agree to pay H. C. Shull twelve cents per cubic yard, for grading done on Ensley avenue.

—For parasols go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., they have just received a large stock, to be sold at prices lower than the lowest.

—Shingle weddings occur when the first child is old enough to spank and continue until it is old enough to object. We object.

—Leave your order at Houston's for ice. He will furnish it in large or small quantities, by the season, by the week or by the pound.

—The rush continues at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. Everybody seems anxious to secure dry goods and clothing at big bargains.

—Have you eaten of the luscious strawberry yet this season? If not, hie yourself to the festival next Wednesday evening.

—Two oyster crackers and a modern box of strawberries make a short cake. —Ex. But they make a long face when the bill comes in.

—Major Sprott returned from Ohio, on Tuesday. He has been absent several weeks taking care of his brother who is in very delicate health.

—Wonder what those fellows shoot at nearly every night out on the square? We never can find even a sick woman or anything to shoot into.

—Decoration day will be observed in Waterloo. R. Wes McBride has been chosen to deliver the address at that place, so we are informed.

—Farmers, go to N. Ensley & Co's for your dress goods, and especially cottonades, all of which are sold at low prices. They can't be beaten.

—Beware of the cool little cucumber. It sticketh closer than a brother, and is liable to cause exceeding much unhappiness in the—digestive organs.

—Work is now progressing on the avenue to the junction, and it will soon be as fine a drive as can be found in the county or perhaps in the state.

—Did you ever see a barber who, after shaving a man, could let him out of the chair without the query, "Hair cut, sir, or a shampoo?" No, never.

—Don't waste your money at high priced stores, when you can save at least 25 per cent. by coming to Auburn and buying at the boot up-side down.

—We are glad to see that Milt Roth is again able to knock around on the streets a little, and hope the summer weather may bring him continued benefit.

—R. D. Teft returned last Monday from Waterloo, where he had been in attendance upon a brother-in-law who has been seriously ill with pleuro-pneumonia.

—The paymaster of the Eel River railroad will be along to-day, paying employes, and estimates made on wood and ties. Be on hand and get your money.

—C. H. Stephenson, the jolly "phat phellow" who travels for Butler, Pitkin & Co., of New York, was in town Monday. He sells to McQuiston & Ralston.

—Our neighbor over the way says that "T. C. Ford has purchased a pheaton." Wonder if it's a live one;—but what in all creation is a "pheaton," anyway?

—The ladies of the M. E. church will hold a strawberry and ice-cream festival in the business room of Dr. Ford's, on the evening of the 21st, to which all are cordially invited.

—Nicholas Ensley and Miss Lydia Hogue say they will sell their millinery goods as cheap as any other house in the county, regardless of what others may advertise.

—Take in the festival of the M. E. church next Wednesday evening, and take in your girl, and take in some ice cream and strawberries, and get taken in if you take in too much.

—Coop. Ralston has just finished a four-jointed ash fish-pole, made from second-growth timber, and it is a neat piece of workmanship. Now look out for an overflow in the fish market.

—Judge McClellan is cracking court business through at a lively rate and is winning handsome compliments from members of the bar for his ability and impartial rulings.—Angola Herald.

—We are informed that the Corunna and Butler bands will be in attendance at the decoration of soldiers' graves in Auburn, on the 30th inst. If the day is pleasant the town will be full of people.

—Messrs. Davis, Austin, Mays and Peterson left on a piscatorial excursion Wednesday morning, for the lake near Churubusco. A special hack will be sent up to-day to haul back the results.

—Those of our farmers who were fortunate enough to get their planting and sowing done before the fine rains of yesterday, and day before, ought to feel as happy as a woman with two tongues.

—In the little difficulty between the state and Bill Britton, a day or two ago, William was taxed three dollars and costs, amounting to some $27. The amount was paid, and William is again square with Indiana.

If there is a butter-knife on the table, as there ought to be, use it; don't be guilty of helping yourself with your own knife and probably leaving some tomatoes or onions mixed up in the butter for some one else to carve out.

Mr. D. K. Houghton tested his seed corn before planting. He showed us sixty grains, taken from thirty ears, all sprouted but two grains, after being in the ground 48 hours.

—If buildings should stand upon solid foundations, men, women and children should do the same, and the way to do it is to buy boots and shoes at the boot up-side down.

—If you want a nice fine dress hat, either in fur or straw, go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., as they have the largest stock to select from, and sell at prices below competition.

—5,000 yards of brown shirtings now in stock at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's., all bought before the advance, and now being sold at the old prices. Do not miss this opportunity to get a bargain.

—Mitch Houston has enlarged his meat market, and removed his office to the front part of the room, where he will be pleased to see his many friends and sell them first-class meat at low prices.

The ladies of the M. E. church will hold a strawberry and ice-cream festival, in Dr. Ford's room on Main St., opposite the postoffice, next Wednesday evening, May 21, to which all are cordially invited.

—Our young friend, W. W. Hoffman, who tried to masticate some "pizen" for the cure of a sore mouth last week, has had better luck this week. He was appointed agent of the B. & O. at Attica, Ohio, and left Monday night for that point.

—Dr. Joel E. Hendricks of Des Moines, Iowa, formerly a resident of this place, and at one time treasurer of this county, made his old friends and acquaintances a brief visit on last Tuesday. We hear the doctor very highly spoken of by those who know him.

—Read the mammoth price list of Messrs. McQuiston & Ralston, on the inclosed supplement. These gentlemen are having an extensive trade, which is rapidly increasing. They offer extra inducements to purchasers, as their prices indicate.

—"Oh! pa," said a little fellow, while gazing out of the window at a passing stranger, "just come and look at this editor!" "How do you know he is an editor?" asked the father. "Because his hair is sticking out through a hole in his hat, and he's gnawing a bone and barefooted!"

—It is all in the way a man has been educated, probably; but as we sit in our office and watch that fellow standing in mid-air, on the extreme northeast corner of the court-house, jerking off the slate, we conclude that it is better to be a one-horse editor than a first-class slate-roofer.

—A woman at Altona, whose name we have been unable to learn, had a rather close call from a scorching last Saturday, her dress having caught fire while she was making soap in the open air. Only for the efforts of a sister, who burned her own hands and arms quite badly, she would probably have burned to death.

—Notice the attractive advertisement of Mr. D. D. Snyder, which appears on the inclosed supplement. Give it a careful perusal, and satisfy yourselves that he is offering a class of agricultural machinery that cannot be excelled. Give him a call when you want machinery of any kind.

—The Ft. W., J. & S. railroad will sell half-fare tickets on Friday, May 30, form New Era, Waterloo, Summit, Pleasant Lake, Angola, Freemont and State Line to Auburn, that being the day on which the decoration of the soldiers' graves will take place here. A large crowd will doubtless be in attendance.

—The depot hack had a hard tussle with the railroad track a few days ago at the Jackson depot. In turning around at the customary place, one of the hind wheels dropped in between the track and the platform and was twisted all out of countenance. Some of the occupants thought there had been a collision.

—The object for which the ladies of the M. E. church give the strawberry and ice-cream festival, Wednesday evening, at the vacant store-room of Dr. Ford, is a worthy one—to raise funds to pay for recent repairs on the church—and every one should contribute what they can towards making it a success; and besides, a good time is in store for those who attend.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick. Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles, and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. Sent for one stamp. Address MURRAY HILL PUB. CO., No. 129 E. 28th St., N. Y. 11-6m.

—We are pleased to learn that our fellow-townsman Capt. Hartman, has been chosen to deliver the oration on decoration day. We trust and believe that his address will be free from political references and unbecoming insinuations that would wound the feelings of any soldier that may be in attendance for the purpose of doing honors to deceased comrades.

—At a mite society and taffy-pulling which held forth Tuesday evening, at Waterloo, were the following young people from this place: Will Shaffer, Pete Eldridge, Eliza Shaffer and the Misses Cowan. They got home at one o'clock next morning; had a mite-y fine time and a heap of "taffy." (This is a candy-ed fact—no "taffy" about it).

—A man named Sands, engineer in a steam flouring mill at Orangeville, in Concord township, was horribly mangled last Monday, while oiling some shafting in the mill. He died at about noon of that day, and leaves a wife and one child. It is said that he gave orders as to how the machinery could be stopped, after one side of his body had been completely crushed in the cog wheels.

—Notwithstanding the postoffice was moved to its present location on Main street over a year ago, persons still stray into Rodenbaugh's harness shop, where the office used to be, and want to know if there are any letters for them. And of course "me" feels that there is some mistake about it when informed that he is in a harness shop.

—Charlie Emanuel requests us to state, in justice to a wronged man, that it is between the millinery store and his SLEEPING APARTMENTS, not his office, that he wants telephonic communication established. Strange we should have made such a blunder; but we make the correction cheerfully, and beg pardon for our ignorance.

—In addition to the new brick ware-room to be built to their store, Messrs. Schaab, Beugnot & Co., have made some improvements in the original building, having cut an archway in the wall of the front room, connecting it with the back, the latter to be used exclusively for groceries. It will make a complete and convenient business house when finished.

—Some parties at Ft. Wayne have just committed an act which gets away with anything on record for absolute meanness. They stole $19 in cash and $30 worth of goods from the store of three poor blind men. This is a veritable illustration of "stealing acorns from a blind sow," and the scoundrels who did it should get three years in a sewer and then be taken out and hung.

—We have received some information concerning a fire which occurred last Sunday morning at Garrett, though the particulars are somewhat limited. The item simply stated that some shops there had burned to the ground, including the "bridge shop, paint shop, etc.," the fire originated from some chemicals in the paint shop. Just what shops these are we are unable, by diligent inquiry, to ascertain, as no one who has been there seems to know anything about it.

—Hank Little offers a reward of $300,000 for the arrest or detention of the unscrupulous wretches who put the fixin's to his emaciated equine, while in pasture, one night last week. He found the horse, early in the morning, hitched at his front gate, gaily bedecked in many-tinted ribbons and rosettes, which were attached to all the prominent features of the old nag's carcass—jaw bones, ribs, joints, mane and tail. The horse looked like the declaration of independence, or a fourth of July celebration, but Hank didn't; he looked sad and thoughtful.

—It finally ended in war. We allude to the "late unpleasantness" existing between Constable Hank Shull and Bill Britton. The massacre took place last Friday, in the bright and beautiful morning, near the town pump, where each had gone to slake his thirst for—water. The drink evidently had a bad effect, neither of them being accustomed to drinking, for it fired their passions and they clashed. William says he never took his hands out of his pockets but once during the skirmish, and then he "liked to got his thumb chawed off." Both men are able to move around without crutches.

—The doctor didn't "fold his tent like the Arab and silently steal away," but he packed up his worldly possessions, just the same as a white man would, and sneaked away to brighter fields, just the same as a white man wouldn't; he has gone to seek a land where the creditors cease from troubling and the debtor gets an occasional rest. He leaves no wife and children to bereave his hasty exit, for he sent them on ahead; he does leave a number of acquaintances, however, who will mourn his untimely departure in various amounts. Friends of the departed are requested to—keep mum.

—Neighboring towns around us have had walking matches by "home talent," towns all over the country have had them, and while they do not always yield a rich financial harvest, in most places they rarely ever fail to furnish abundant sport for the boys. Some of our young men here have recently stirred the matter up—in fact, got it quite riley—and we see no reason why an attempt of that kind could not be made in Auburn and bring forth fun, at least, as a result. "Hire a hall," boys, and get down to your work; charge ten cents admission, to defray only actual expenses, and make up a purse for the contestants to sweat for. It will serve, at all events, to diversify the present monotony, and will create more fun than a drove of monkeys.

—Readers of a newspaper, who get all the happenings of their town and neighborhood dished up ready for devouring, scarcely ever think of the time and trouble and hustling around it requires to grind out the matter; they are apt to look upon it as a nice, easy, entertaining business, full of variety and pleasure and devoid of anything like fatigue or monotony. Fine reader, if you have ever indulged such an hallucination, we would hasten to dispel it, for you have gone astray. A newspaper man has cares and perplexities which are strangers to other business men, and of which they can form no conception. If you don't believe it, mister, tackle a small printing-office and a big lead-pencil and try it.

A Three-Hundred-Dollar Blaze.

Last night, at about half past eleven o'clock, while absorbed in the mysteries of six or eight columns of proof sheets, in preparation for to-day's COURIER, we were startled by the unearthly yells of some deep-lunged individual who was proclaiming to the sleeping citizens of Auburn that somebody or something, as we first understood it, was "a liar." Being anxious to learn who this untruthful person might be, we took a giraffe step down stairs and landed almost in the arms of Gen. Durkee, our efficient night-watchman; he was evidently in a hurry, we noticed, and so didn't detain him, but the remark we caught, while he was making about thirty-five miles an hour up Seventh street, was something to this effect: "Great God! the whole d—n town is a-fire." Hastening around to the corner of Fifth and Jackson streets, we found it—a one-story frame dwelling house, occupied by Mrs. Lizzie J. Lanigan, a widow, and her two children. From her we learned that the fire was a mystery; she was unable to tell where it originated, but thought it was in the kitchen; she stated that somebody's pounding on the door was the first she knew of it, and even then she didn't pay much attention to it, thinking that it was some drunken parties who had been heard in the neighborhood only a short time before; but upon opening a door in the middle of the house, she realized that it was time to vacate the premises. By the energetic exertions of some of the citizens and neighbors, who had assembled by this time, all the household goods were saved; but the house, which is owned by J. A. McKay, is now in ashes. It was valued at about $300, and was uninsured. Time to organize a fire company, isn't it?

Over The River.

DIED, Wednesday morning, May 7th, 1879, at her home in Auburn, DeKalb county, Indiana, of heart disease, Esther Eldridge, beloved wife of Thomas Baldock, in the fifty-ninth year of her age.

Our departed friend was born March 14, 1821, in Hurst Green, county of Sussex, England. She left her native country July 4, 1841; landed in New York Sept. 3d, and arrived in Fort Wayne, Indiana, on the 20th of the same month. She was united in marriage to Thomas Baldock, August 11, 1843, and continued to reside in Fort Wayne until Nov. 10, 1855, when with her husband and four children, she removed to Auburn, where, after a residence of nearly twenty-four years, in the sure hope of a joyful resurrection and blessed immortality through Christ, her life, rich in loving deeds, has closed on earth, to continue in eternity. Mrs. Baldock was the mother of ten children. Of these the Lord, who doeth all things well, long ago took three to himself, and now the beloved mother, reunited to those little ones, leaves her husband and seven children to mourn her departure, while even in their deepest sorrow they rejoice in the memory of her goodness. For almost thirty six years she has stood by her husband, a hopeful, loving, tender wife, his best friend, his wisest counselor. To her children she has been the most loving of mothers, watchful, patient and untiring. To her neighbors—and all who needed her help were her neighbors—she was always the kindest, most faithful and sympathizing of friends in sickness or trouble. Those cold hands, now lying pulseless, were never idle before, while hundreds of hearts bless the memory of her whose tender ministrations have lightened their burdens and eased their sufferings. Mrs. Baldock was baptised and reared in the faith of the Episcopal church, and remained its devout and legal member until her death. Although for so many years deprived of the services of her beloved church, she never ceased to long for them, and the rare occasions of late years when she was permitted to enjoy them, were precious hours to her. And we, who knew her, bless God's holy name for his servant departed this life in his faith and fear.

Proceedings of the Town Board.

At a special session of the board of trustees, held at the office of the clerk, on Monday evening, May 7th, 1879, all the newly elected trustees were present. Upon motion Mr. A. C. Wilson was elected president of the board for the ensuing year. The amounts fixed for the bonds of the clerk, treasurer and marshal were as follows:

Clerk	$ 500
Treasurer	6,000
Marshal	6,000

Board adjourned.

At a special meeting of the Board, held on Friday evening May 9th, the Board in behalf of the town agreed to pay Henry C. Shull, the sum of five cents per cubic yard for grading done on Ensley avenue, said Shull to give bond for the fulfillment of the contract.

Board adjourned.

Old Settlers' Meeting.

The executive committee of the Old Settlers' association of DeKalb county are requested to meet at Rose & Hartman's office, in Auburn, on Wednesday, May 28, 1879, at 2 o'clock p. m., to perfect arrangements for the meeting to be held at Auburn on the 19th of June. It is requested that all the members of the committee should be present.

T. D. GROSS, Chairman.

Is it any Wonder.

In view of the immense amount of adulterated baking powder used by the masses of people in food, is it any wonder that there are diseased gums, decayed teeth and disordered digestion? To escape these evils, use Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, the only kind made by a Physician, with great care.

Attention Farmers.

Remember that you can save one hundred per cent. in the growth of fruit trees, and fifty per cent. in prices, by buying of S. E. Tracey. Trees delivered the same day they are taken out of the ground.

CLOTHING
And Furnishing Goods
To a Queen's Taste.

We employ only men who understand their business. We sell only a class of goods that we know will wear, and give satisfaction. We use only such trimmings as befit good work, and last but not least, we have the knack of fitting men, boys or children in as good, and often-time better manner, than high-toned tailors, with war-time prices. All the latest novelties are shown by us as soon as they appear, and we are usually called the C. O. D., One-Price, Square Dealers, Clothiers, Men's Furnishers and Hatters, but sign ourselves

THE GENUINE
DR. C. McLANE'S
CELEBRATED
FOR THE CURE OF
Hepatitis, or Liver Complaint,
DYSPEPSIA AND SICK HEADACHE.

Symptoms of a Diseased Liver.

PAIN in the right side, under the edge of the ribs, increases on pressure; sometimes the pain is in the left side; the patient is rarely able to lie on the left side; sometimes the pain is felt under the shoulder blade, and it frequently extends to the top of the shoulder, and is sometimes mistaken for rheumatism in the arm. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness; the bowels in general are costive, sometimes alternative with lax; the head is troubled with pain, accompanied with a dull, heavy sensation in the back part. There is generally a considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. A slight, dry cough is sometimes an attendant. The patient complains of weariness and debility; he is easily startled, his feet are cold or burning, and he complains of a prickly sensation of the skin; his spirits are low; and although he is satisfied that exercise would be beneficial to him, yet he can scarcely summon up fortitude enough to try it. In fact, he distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred where few of them existed, yet examination of the body, after death, has shown the LIVER to have been extensively deranged.

AGUE AND FEVER.

DR. C. MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS, IN CASES OF AGUE AND FEVER, when taken with Quinine, are productive of the most happy results. No better cathartic can be used, preparatory to, or after taking Quinine. We would advise all who are afflicted with this disease to give them a FAIR TRIAL.

For all bilious derangements, and as a simple purgative, they are unequaled.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The genuine are never sugar coated.

Every box has a red wax seal on the lid, with the impression DR. MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS.

The genuine MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS bear the signatures of C. MCLANE and FLEMING BROS. on the wrappers.

Insist upon having the genuine DR. C. MCLANE'S LIVER PILLS, prepared by Fleming Bros., of Pittsburgh, Pa., the market being full of imitations of the name McLane, spelled differently but same pronunciation.

THE RING MY MOTHER WORE.

The earth has many treasures rare,
In gems and golden ore;
My heart hath one, more precious far—
The ring my mother wore.
I saw it first, when I, a child,
Was playing by her side;
She told me then 'twas father's
When she became his bride.

I saw it oft in sorrow's hours,
Which marked the after years,
When shining on the soft white hand
That wiped away my tears.
And, oh! I saw it once again,
When, on her dying bed,
[illegible]
And laid it on my head.

Beside that bed, where fell my tears,
The ring to me was given;
She placed it on my hand, and said,
"We'll meet again in heaven!"
I kissed the cheek I oft had pressed,
From which the rose had fled:
And, bowed with grief, stood motherless,
Alone, beside the dead.

Among the blest in realms above,
Where sorrows are unknown,
Oh, may I meet my mother dear,
No more to weep alone.
Her dying words of love and faith
I'll cherish evermore
Within the heart which holds so dear
The ring my mother wore.

BERTHILDA'S OFFER.

Mr. Flint had the reputation of being as hard as his name. Certainly he was a crusty sort of old gentleman, with a disagreeable habit of telling what he considered to be the plain truth to every one. As every one did not at once bow low and say, "Mr. Flint, you are perfectly right," this habit of frankness had brought him into a great many quarrels with his friends and relatives, so that at last the only one of his own blood with whom he was on speaking terms was his orphan niece Berthilda, who kept house for him, to whom he was unusually kind, and who believed him to be a modern Solomon.

She had never once contradicted him. When he told her that the Flints were generally good-looking, but that she took after her mother's family, who were all as plain as pike-staffs, she answered, "Yes, uncle, but that is not my fault, you know." When he said she need not mind about being good-looking, because, after all, she was a nice little thing, and would be more apt to be left to keep house for him forever, she appeared to be comforted. She was mild and meek, and her vanity had been taken out of her by her uncle's frankness.

She was really by no means so very plain, but she accepted Mr. Flint's opinion without a murmur. It was all genuine. She was one of those little women who naturally bow down before the head of the family and worship him. She had not even reflected that he might leave her his money, or some portion of it. It was too dreadful to think of Uncle Flint's ever dying at all.

As for marrying, it did not enter Berthilda's mind. She had written herself down a spinster as soon as she had heard Uncle Flint's opinion on the subject, which was oracularly given when she was about 16 years of age; but now that she was nearly 30, she was astonished by the appearance of a lover, in the shape of a stout farmer of 40, a widower without children, and owner of as fine a piece of property as could be found in the State.

It was a case of love at first sight on his part, and Berthilda, finding herself made love to, and being quite unused to the situation, felt that it was her duty to refuse him, since to marry would be to contradict Uncle Flint's distinct assertion that she was born to be an old maid; and yet she yielded to the advances of Mr. Hoskins so far as to allow herself to be seen home from "meeting," kissed at the gate, and occasionally encircled by a very large arm, which, after a squeeze or two, she always put away with a shocked little squeal.

Finally Mr. Hoskins offered himself, and Berthilda, having confessed to a partiality for him, ended by asserting that Uncle Flint should decide the matter, and that she dared not mention the subject to him.

"Well, then, I will," said Mr. Hoskins. "I ain't afraid of no man, and, if your uncle has anything agin' me, he can out with it and prove it. I'll write and ask him, since you are so partikerler, Berthildy; though, bein' of age, I can't see why he has anything to say about it."

To which Berthilda, sobbing, replied that her uncle's word was her law, and was kissed at the gate, as usual, this conversation having taken place on a Sunday evening on the way from church.

On Monday morning old Mr. Flint, going after breakfast into the little room which he called his office, and where he transacted his business as notary public, found lying on his desk two letters already left for him that morning, and, opening them, found that each asked him for something.

One was from a neighbor named Perkins, who desired to borrow a horse of him. The other from Farmer Hoskins, asking for his niece Berthilda's hand.

Mr. Flint was not in the habit of lingering long over any decision. He regarded the fact that Berthilda had had an offer as a sort of miracle not likely to occur again, and he had an idea that women always like to get married.

Hoskins was well-to-do and respectable. She should have him, if she chose. She had been a good girl to him, and he really felt an affection for her.

As for Perkins, he should not have his horse. He had overworked the one he had borrowed of him last harvest-time, and the poor brute had died in consequence. Lend Perkins his gray mare, indeed! He would give him a piece of his mind for his impudence. And he would settle that business before he attended to Berthilda's offer.

So he drew his blotter toward him, seized a pen and ink, and indited this peppery epistle:

SIR: I don't wonder you wrote, and adn't the face to come and see me for what you wanted, like a man. Let you have her, indeed! When every one knows you killed the other one with hard work, and only sent her home to be buried. A pretty idea that, indeed! She was just a rack of bones when you got through with her, and, I judge, half starved, as well as worked to death.

You'll promise to take good care of her, no doubt. You may, if you get her; but you'll only do that by stealing her, and, as I suppose you're quite capable of that, I shall see to my locks. FLINT.

This finished, he wrote more briefly to Mr. Hoskins:

DEAR SIR: I can't see anything in the way of you having what you want. You can come over, if you like, and talk it over. Yours, FLINT.

Having done these, he put each into an envelope and sent them off.

Poor Berthilda scarcely dared to raise her eyes to her uncle's face that day; but his manner to her was unusually kind, and she had allowed herself to hope much from it, when, as she sat at her knitting in the evening, Peggy, the sole domestic, beckoned mysteriously to her from the door; and, having thus beguiled her into the hall, informed her that Mr. Hoskins wanted to see her at the gate.

To the gate Berthilda went in a state of nervous agitation which made the blue-ribbon bow in her hair quiver like a humming-bird, and there she found Mr. Hoskins, so red in the face with rage that the color was perceptible by the moonlight. And his greeting was this:

"Berthildy, if old Flint was anybody's uncle but yourn I'd go in and pummel the breath out of him. I've a minter do it now."

"Oh, dear!" sobbed Berthilda, "what is the matter?"

"He's writ me a letter that was jest chock full of insults from fust to last," said Mr. Hoskins. "Said I writ 'cause I was afraid to ask him for you; said every one knew that I killed Abigal Araminty with overwork, and starved her to death, and sent her over to her ma's to be buried. Now Abigal Araminty died of the consumption that was in her family, and I spent lots in doctor's stuffs; and, if she was buried from her ma's, that was the old lady's wish. And Araminty, she would go there to die. And I did all mortal man could, and I hired help, and I wasn't nowise hard on Abigal Araminty; and your uncle, he's a liar, and if he'll come out here I'll wring his neck. I've as much as I kin do to keep from saying words a man hadn't orter say after he's jined the church. I never was so mad in my life. I'm bursting with rage; and he says I'm a thief, and he's no doubt I'll steal you, if I can; and so I will. It's jest this, Berthilda—you come along with me now, and get Parson Speer to marry us, or there's an end of it. It's all up between us. You choose betwixt old Flint and me, and, if you choose him, why, I ain't under no obligations to you no longer, and I'll make jelly of him in three shakes of a sheep's tail."

At these words Berthilda trembled more than ever. "The fountains that were in her head overflowed and ran out of her eyes adown her cheeks."

"O! O! O!" she sobbed, "was ever a poor woman in such trouble? O! O!"

"Choose!" cried Hoskins; "and darned if I ain't so mad I don't keer much which way you choose. I'd rather like to be at liberty to go for old Flint and mash—by jingo, I had!"

"Why don't I die?" sobbed Berthilda. "But, O, Silas, I can't leave Uncle Flint like that. It wouldn't be decent."

"Then here goes!" said Silas Hoskins, taking off his cuffs.

At this moment a long, lath-like figure strode past them and began to hammer at the door.

The servant opened it, and Peter Perkins' voice inquired for Mr. Flint.

Mr. Flint at once appeared in the entry.

"Well, what do you want here?" was the salutation.

"Wall, Mr. Flint," said Peter Perkins, "seein' you was so 'bligin' and neighborly about that gray mare, I kinker reckoned I'd jest step in and lead her over to-night. You see I get in my hay to-morrer, and there's a rain a comin' up along the end of the week, or I ain't no prophet."

"So you do mean to steal her?" said old Flint. "I've seen impudence before, but this caps all."

"Kinder guess you've forgot who I am?" said Peter Perkins. "Don't you remember a writin' to me this morning? I'm Mr. Peter Perkins, Mr. Flint."

"I know you well enough," said Flint. "D'ye think I'm in my dotage? You're the man that killed my brown horse last summer, and asked for my gray mare to do the same by this. And I told you what I thought of you in my note. You must have been drinking, Mr. Perkins! You must be drunk, sir, to ask me for my gray mare after what I wrote you this morning!"

"I drinking? I never touch anything but tea. I'm a Son of Temperance, sir!" shouted Mr. Perkins, so that his voice reached the ears of the unhappy couple at the gate. "I drunk!"

"Then if you're sober you can't read!" said Mr. Flint.

"You wrote me a note telling me to come over, and saying there was nothing in the way of my having the gray mare," said Mr. Perkins.

"That's untrue, sir!" said Mr. Flint.

"You're a lying, sir!" said Mr. Perkins. "Hanged if I'll stand it!" And now Miss Berthilda saw her uncle menaced by a bony fist, and flew up the path, with Hoskins after her.

"You abominable rascal!" cried Mr. Flint.

"Tells me I'm drunk and a liar, sir," cried Perkins to Hoskins. "Asked him neighbor-like to lend me his gray mare, and he wrote he would, and now calls me all the names he can lay his tongue to."

"I don't doubt it, sir!" said Mr. Hoskins. "He's insulted me, sir. Told me I worked my poor late Abigal Araminty to death and starved her, and was a thief and afeard of him. Writ that to me, sir! Hang him!"

"That's false!" said old Flint.

"Now, I'm a liar, am I?" cried Hoskins.

"You are both insane!" cried Flint.

"You never writ that to me?" cried Hoskins.

"No doubt it's true, but I didn't!" cried Flint.

"He is crazy," said Hoskins.

"Mad as a March hare," said Perkins.

"You are a couple of lunatics. I'll be protected against you. Here! help! Some one go for the constable!"

"A lunatic!" said Mr. Perkins. "Why, there's the letter you writ me. If you were a young man, I'd not stop to argy; but you're old enough to be my father—"

"That's another lie," said Flint. "You're 50 years old."

"Well, that's the letter you writ me, any way," said Perkins, holding out a crumpled sheet of paper.

Flint took it in his hand, glanced at it, and said, "It isn't;" but his face altered.

"Contradicts anything," said Perkins.

"I suppose you'll deny that you wrote me that?" said Hoskins, offering another letter to the old man.

"Yes, I do," he said; but this time he grinned.

"Perhaps a secret enemy," murmured Berthilda.

Uncle Flint looked at her; her nose was red with weeping.

"You're a good girl, Berthilda, if you are an ugly one," said Uncle Flint. "For your sake I'll explain matters. I wrote both those letters, but I sent them to a wrong man. That's yours, Hoskins. Perkins, that's yours; and I meant every word of it!" And he handed the letters to their proper owners.

"I'll see if this ain't a case of libel," said Perkins, as he walked off.

But Hoskins advanced and held out his large hand.

"Let bygones be bygones," he said. "May I have Berthilda, Mr. Flint?"

"You can ask her," said Flint.

And though Berthilda only said, "Oh, dear," and cried again, Hoskins was contented, and the wedding came off in due time.

How to Extinguish Fires.

Better than all elaborate and costly apparatus for extinguishing fires are constant care and watchfulness, and quick and intelligent action on the part of those who first discover a fire in progress. The fire which at the beginning could be smothered with a pocket-handkerchief, or dashed out with a bucket of water, neglected a few hours, lays in waste millions of dollars' worth of property. If there is any time in which a person should be cool and calm, in perfect command of himself, it is when he discovers a fire that threatens the destruction of life and property. The first thing to do is to learn precisely where it is; the second, to consider the chances of extinguishing it. Of course, in cities an alarm should at once be sent out, but at the same time a vigorous effort should be made to put out the fire with the means at hand, for sometimes what the fire engine is unable to accomplish when it reaches the scene can be done by one or two persons who act promptly before the flames have had time to gain headway.

First, then, do not be alarmed on account of smoke. Frequently there is a great deal of smoke before the fire has made much progress. Remember that one can pass through smoke by keeping his head near the floor, or by enveloping it in a wet woolen cloth. On entering a room to fight down a fire single-handed, keep the door closed behind, if possible. A pail of water and a tin dipper in the hand of a resolute person can be made to work a miracle at the beginning. If the fire has progressed too far to admit of this course, and it is necessary to depend entirely on outside help, then see to it that every door and window is closed. By so doing, if there is a fire-engine in the neighborhood, it will often be possible to confine the fire to one room.

Every person who stops at a hotel should take special pains before retiring to note the location of the stairways, so that in case of an alarm he can find his way out, even though the halls are filled with smoke. Never leave a room where there is an alarm of fire without first securing a wet towel, or, if possible, a wet sponge or piece of woolen cloth through which to breathe. If escape by the stair is cut off, seek an outside window and stay there till help comes. Above all things, be cool and have your wits about you. When a lady's dress takes fire, let her fall on the floor at once, and call for help, in the meantime reaching for some rug or woolen cloth with which to smother the flames. There is nothing new in this advice; it has been repeated in one form or other hundreds of times, but it will bear repeating thousands of times.—American Builder.

An Heroic Mountaineer.

Ben Moody, a mountaineer, living near Blowing Rock, in Watauga county, met with a terrible death while engaged in log-rolling. Log-rollings are often attended with accidents, usually of a fatal character, owing to the fact that often the logs have to be rolled down steep declivities. This process is called training, and requires both strength and skill. It was while Ben Moody and Bob Green were training a log that the former met his death. They had rolled the log some distance down the mountain toward the heap, but when they had reached the steepest part in the route both men discovered that they were unable to manage it, and determined to turn it loose. Moody placed his spike near the center of the log and told his companion to leap for his life, and that he would follow. Green jumped and cleared the track of the log, but when Moody attempted to follow his foot caught in a projecting root, and the next moment the log passed over his body. Every bone in his body was broken, and he scarcely breathed when his companion reached him. Moody's conduct in forcing his friend to leave the dangerous position in which they were placed, while he faced it with unflinching nerve, smacks of the heroic.—Raleigh (N. C.) News.

Sewing in the Boston Schools.

The teaching of sewing in the Boston schools is very successful. Although instruction is given to each girl only two hours in every week, those pupils who came into school in September not even knowing how to hold a needle are able to hem nicely and to sew over-seams at the end of the first term. The special teacher prepares the work at home, so that it can be put promptly into the hands of the pupils without wasting a moment.—Boston Traveller.

NIHILISM AND NIHILISTS.

A DROSKY driver of St. Petersburg asked his customer, who appeared to be a nobleman, what the Nihilists were. "Nihil means nothing," was the reply, "and people who have nothing in the pocket, nothing in the way of land, nothing in the shape of property, and nothing of the nature of a title, are called Nihilists." "Yes, yes," said the drosky driver, "then Russia is full of Nihilists, and even I also am a Nihilist."

IT is reported in London that the Czar and the Emperor of Germany are endeavoring to form an international society of sovereigns—a sort of new holy alliance—for the suppression of Socialism and regicide. The Emperor of Germany is said to have originated this idea, in a letter to the Czar, in which the demoralizing effect of international jealousies, necessitating the maintenance of great standing armies, is deplored, and the suggestion of a mutual protective association, having for its object the preservation of universal peace and prompt punishment of King-killers, is feelingly urged. In this connection, it is reported that there is definite knowledge of the existence of a conspiracy to kill all the sovereigns of Europe, Queen Victoria and the Pope included, and that the bloody-minded thugs are bound to follow up every failure with a fresh attack.

THE Nihilists who planned the assassination of the Emperor of Russia gave public notice of their intention in placards posted for three days in the streets of St. Petersburg. The notice was in the form of a proclamation addressed to "Mr. Alexander Nicolaievitch"—Alexander, son of Nicholas—and proclaimed the purpose of the conspirators to "free the people from administrative persecution, which throws them guiltless into prison, and there, without compassion, chastises them and allows them to suffer from hunger and thirst, and then leads them as insurgents to the gallows, or sends them to the polar regions to work in the mines. We shall recoil from no means that may lead us to our object," it added, "which is the eradication of the hellish brutality of despotism through fire and sword. And if you, Alexander Nicolaievitch, refuse to hear our warning voice and put an end to this tyranny, we hereby declare to you that tyranny will be beaten in the end." The effect of the more energetic policy of despotism, lately adopted upon these audacious conspirators, is yet to be seen.

THE terrorism of the revolutionary government established by the Nihilists in Russia inspires the greatest alarm, and the measures taken by the authorities are regarded as totally insufficient to cope with the evil. The revolutionary propaganda is believed chiefly to proceed from the universities and colleges, and it is said that new restrictions are to be imposed on young men entering these institutions; but it is rightly pointed out that such a measure would only strengthen the opposition to the existing rrder of things. The true remedy, it is urged, would be the grant of liberal institutions to Russia. A striking demonstration in this sense took place the other day at a banquet given to the celebrated novelist Tourgenieff. The eminent St. Petersburg advocate, M. Spassovitch, made a brilliant speech on this occasion, in which, proposing a toast to the youth of Russia, he defended them against their accusers, and pleaded for liberal reforms as the best guarantees of the future welfare of the country. The speech was warmly applauded by the many distinguished representatives of the educated class in Russia who were present; but it has been attacked by the Government papers, who call M. Spassovitch a "Polish revolutionist," and accuse Tourgenieff of total ignorance of Russian affairs.

THE doctrines held by the Russian Socialist Propaganda are enunciated with frankness in some extracts published by the Krymski Listok. The following are passages from the Vpered (Forward): "Republican ideas are a chimera. Garibaldi and Felix Pyat are behind the age." The burning of Paris by the Commune in 1871 "threw a ray of light on the future;" but the Commune "took no decisive step; it only imposed a task on the social revolution which it had not the courage to achieve itself." The new Socialist school will not restrict itself to the "half measures of the Commune;" it "will not shrink from any amount of severity," and will wage "a merciless war against society"—"a war of plunder, incendiarism, and assassination." The Nabat (Alarm Bell) preaches "the annihilation of middle-class society, and the burial of the Old World beneath its ruins." "The institution of the family is to be destroyed, the right of property abolished, religion ignored, and even liberty disregarded as an empty question." According to the Narodnaya Rasprava (National Execution), the Socialists will "come forward with arms in their hands to execute all hangmen, traders, and landed proprietors;" will "spread terror among all of different opinions from themselves;" and will "destroy everything—persons, things, or circumstances—that disturb the work. Those who are not with us are against us, and must fall under the bullets of our revolvers."

The Last Witch-Burning in Europe.

It is generally stated that the last witch was burned in Europe in 1793, in Prussian Poland. But this has now become a mistake. She was burned Feb. 26, 1879, in Vratshevo, in the Government of Novgorod, Russia. Her name was Agrafena Ignatieva. She was a soldier's widow, and seems early in life to have acquired fame for her skill in various secret arts. The name once acquired, she profited by it. Without working, she had plenty of good things, for the peasants of the neighborhood stood in great awe of her, and sent to her house the best of their harvests. But at last Nemesis overtook her. Fits of epilepsy became uncommonly frequent in that part of the country, and they were invariably attributed to Agrafena's evil eye. In the beginning they increased her reputation, but, finally, the fear of her grew into terror, and the instinct of self-defense awakened. One day a young girl, in a fit of epilepsy, mentioned Agrafena's name, and a few hours later on the whole population of the country gathered around her hut, among them the Justice of the Peace and two members of the representative assembly of the Government. There was a short parley between Agrafena and the crowd. Then she was driven into the house; doors and windows were closed, the house was set on fire, and, while the unhappy woman cried, screamed and prayed for her life, the crowd stood unmoved, looking on to the last, and sang hymns in praise of the Savior who had delivered them from Satan.—Exchange.

English Habits of Eating and Drinking.

Richard Grant White, in a recent number of the Atlantic, described his amazement at seeing, in a railway carriage, a refined and beautiful English woman of the upper middle class take out a bottle of brandy and drink liberally from it.

The incident, it is said, was an index to an undeniable feature of English life. No American who has gone back to our "Old Home," as Hawthorne calls it, can have failed to notice the grossness of appetite of the majority of both men and women.

Both sexes in every class are, as a rule, heavy feeders. At private houses the young girls of the family, ordinarily, eat very much more than would satisfy the same number of American men. We simply state a fact, due, probably, to the Saxon blood, foggy climate, and heavy physique of our English cousins.

Liquor, too, of every kind is used to a degree in England which we would consider extreme. Beer flows in most households as freely as water in ours. It is a part of the agreement with servants that a definitely-stated amount of beer shall be furnished per day for their use.

Agricultural laboring men often do not taste meat once a month, but they will have their beer. Indeed, through its use for generations there can be no doubt that the lowest classes of England have grown stolid and dull.

In families of the better classes—and that from the very brightest down—ale, wines and brandies are in common use. Children, delicate maidens, fastidious matrons, the Queen and Princesses, use them as a matter of course.

William Black, it will be remembered, makes his charming heroines join in the whisky-punch when it is going round; which is true to the life. Yet Englishmen speak with disgust of the "American habit of tippling."

The fact is that the ordinary American drinks and "treats" at a bar because he is usually ashamed to do it at home. Public sentiment is against drunkenness here.

It is not so in England, and the effect is seen in the physical coarseness of many of the women after they are 40, be they scullions or Duchesses—a fact which Hawthorne noted, by-the-way—and in a corresponding mental heaviness, which often shows itself in a lack of tact, and delicacy even, in Englishmen of the highest intelligence, and who possess the noblest qualities of character.—Youth's Companion.

Divorce in Germany.

A divorce case came lately before the courts in Germany, the judicial action on which shows a wonderful facillty for obtaining a separation in that country. The marriage can hardly be classed with those made in heaven, and the arguments in favor of its dissolution do not present either of the parties to the suit in a very prepossessing light. It was, in fact, a matter of sharp practice on both sides. The lady made the first movement toward a matrmionial alliance by advertising in a newspaper and holding out as an inducement to a suitable person, the fact that she possessed a fortune of 6,000 marks, or about $1,500. A young man of shrewd and cautious business habits read the advertisement and answered it in a sympathetic spirit, but with, however, the rather important reservation that he would not marry the young woman until the money was produced, his purpose being to purchase a business, upon the proceeds of which they might live. His caution, however, was subsequently thawed out, and it appears that the marriage actually took place before the cash payment, the gallant husband and lover insisting on a stipulation that the 6,000 marks would be paid over within eight days from his wedding-day. When the payment came to be made there were only 600 marks forthcoming instead of 6,000, and hence the husband's resort to legal redress. He urged the nullity of the marriage because of the deceit which had been practiced upon him, and got a decision in his favor, which was probably more than he deserved.

Horrible Death.

A singularly painful and sad experience has been that of a burglar who has been emulating the exploits of Mr. Peace, at Sheffield, England. The plunder-seeker determined to enter a pawnbroker's shop by the chimney. Descending to within six feet of the fireplace, he stuck fast, however, and, despite all his efforts, failed to get free. For four long hours he struggled in vain, and then the servant of the pawnbroker came and lighted the fire below. Then the roasting of the burglar began. What kind of sensation the robber experienced we are left to imagine; all that is known is that, after three hours of torture, his groans became so audible that the proprietor of the place heard them, and, sending for the police and a builder, did the best he could to extricate the thief. This proved, however, to be no easy matter, for before the intrapped rascal could be rescued the brickwork had to be taken down. When found, the miserable man was imbedded firmly, "crying fearfully." His mouth and eyes were filled with soot, and he was "dreadfully scorched," and he died immediately after he was taken out.

MOTHER'S BOYS.

Yes, I know there are stains on my carpet—
The traces of small, muddy boots;
And I see your fair tapestry, glowing
All spotless with blossoms and fruits

And I know that my parlor is littered
With many odd treasures and toys;
While your own is in daintiest order
Unharmed by the presence of boys!

Yes, I know I have jackets that wear out,
And buttons that never will stay;
While you can embroider at leisure,
And learn pretty arts of crochet.

Yes, I know there are four little bedsides
Where I must stand watchful each night;
While you may go out in your carriage,
And flash in your dresses so bright!

Now I think I'm a neat little woman;
I like my house orderly, too;
And I'm fond of all dainty belongings;
Yet I would not change places with you!

No! Keep your fair home, with its order,
Its freedom from trouble and noise;
And keep your own fanciful leisure,
But give me my four splendid boys!

The Senate as Able as Ever.

Though there is still some rubbish on both sides in the Senate, yet, in proportion to its number, what single chamber of any legislative body in the world is superior to it in ability, experience and capacity for dealing with questions of practical legislation and questions involving the discussion of great fundamental principles of government? Taking them all in all, it is doubtful whether the Senatorial debates in the days of Webster, Clay and Calhoun disclose greater power and ability than will be found in the discussions of the Senate during the coming two years. In comparing the present with the past, it is well to remember in those earlier days what Daniel Webster said or did was but a small part of the Senate proceedings. If one is disposed to study the Congressional debates of the present day he will find much to excite his admiration; but to do this properly one must fight his personal and party prejudices.—Washington letter

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

The Little Woman.

Don't talk to me of Olympus' maids,
"Divinely tall and fair"—
Of Cleopatra's imperial form,
Of Juno's stately air.
These mighty dames, with redoubted names,
May ever have held their sway;
'Tis the little woman—bless her heart—
Who rules the world to-day.

'Tis the little woman that goes ahead
When men would lag behind,
The little woman who sees her chance
And always knows her mind—
Who can slyly smile as she takes the oath
To honor, love, obey,
And mentally add the saving clause
In a little woman's way.

Would the diamond seem such a perfect gem
If it measured one foot round?
Would the rose-leaf yield such a sweet perfume
If it covered yards of ground;
Would the dew-drop seem so clear and pure
If dew like rain would fall?
Or the little woman be half so great
If she were six feet tall?

'Tis the hand as soft as the nestling bird
That grips the grip of steel;
'Tis the voice as low as the summer wind
That rules without appeal;
And the warrior, scholar, the saint and sage,
May fight and plan and pray,
The world will wag till the end of time
In the little woman's way.

The Jersey Valuation of Misses.

Notwithstanding the fact that the ice cream and strawberry festival season will soon be ushered in, a New Jersey church congregation, at Englewood, has devised a new and very taking scheme for raising funds. It has many advantages over the old grab-bag and fair schemes, as it costs nothing to get up, and is bound in time to wrench the last shekel out of every man in the community, if the sisters are endowed with proper christian fortitude and have physical endurance to stand it. The plan is simply to charge so much for kissing and hugging the sisters. A rate of charges was fixed, which appears to be very reasonable and just. Until competition starts up, the figures given, and which were here charged, may be regarded as the ruling prices of the market: Ten cents for kissing a girl between 15 and 20; five cents extra for hugging. Five cents for kissing a girl between 20 and 30; five cents extra for hugging. Over thirty five cents all round. For kissing a young widow, 25 cents; hugging, 10 cents extra. For kissing a married lady, 50 cents; hugging, 25 cents extra. The new plan worked like a charm. The revenues were large; the sisters made supremely happy, and although the young men in the town over-exerted themselves and were desperately wild, yet they were not satisfied.—Phila. Record.

A Funny Divorce Suit.

Washington probably has as many curious phases of the divorce of husband and wife as any city in the country. Every day brings something new. The last is a somewhat notable family we see together daily, apparently in harmony. They consist of husband, wife and two little babies, who lived together at the home of the husband's parents until the wife's certificate of divorce came along some weeks ago, from Indiana (grounds "incompatibility of temper,") and thereupon the wife packed up her trunks, gathered up one of the children, and moved over to the home of her own parents, who are well-to-do people. It is all very pleasant—the ex-husband, with his one-half of the progeny, politely accompanied the ex-wife and her division of offspring, and had her baggage stowed away in her own home, after a little family chat all round, the male division withdrew with his baby. At the door, "Ta-ta, come and see me when you can," quoth she. "I will, my dear, you must come around and see us when you can," quoth he. The babies were kissed by the several parties in interest, and the ex-husband and his half of the nuptial issue went off cheerily homeward. And so they keep it up; daily visits. The wife was born in this city, and never has been a dozen miles away from it. Neither of the parties have ever seen the Hoosier state. But an Indiana court decreed them divorced.—Washington Capitol.

Human Thorns.

There are certain disagreeable people in this world who seem to take a special delight in annoying others by reminding them of things they would willingly forget. They are human thorns, forever torturing their fellow-men for the sake of torture. Has a man met with misfortune in his business, they are forever recalling the fact. Has a man in times that are gone wandered into devious paths, they are forever reminding him of it, often by congratulating him that that is past. Has a man blundered, they are forever telling him what "might have been." When the thorn is of the masculine gender, there is one way of getting relief. He can be knocked down, and taught manners. When the thorn is of the feminine gender, the case is different, and not so easily disposed of. But Causeur hears of one such scourge in petticoats who got her deserts the other evening. It was at a little party, where some score of people were gathered together. The thorn sat near a young man who, in days gone by, had been guilty of follies that cost him dearly. He had put them all behind him. But the thorn took occasion to recall them in a subdued and confidential tone. The victim, who had been subjected to the same torture before, spoke up so that all could hear, "Madam," he said, "for five years I have been trying to forget all that. You have been trying to remember it. You have succeeded better than I. I congratulate you." The thorn subsided.—Causeur in Boston Transcript.

To Be or Not to Be—Bored?

A large proportion of society is incessantly crying out, "What boredom is its pleasures! what toils are its amusements!" and yet day after day, night after night, is tamely submitting to the toil and sorrow they entail. To live entirely in the family circle we all admit to be an unwise and rather dreary existence. All of us have not arrived at the melancholy condition of an old gentleman we know who elected to stay always at home, and when on being asked if he did not find it dull answered simply: "Well, you see, I am bored everywhere, and I may as well be bored at home in comfort as bored in other people's houses in discomfort!" None of us, we will assume, want to shut ourselves from our kind. On the contrary, we wish to mix with them, talk with them, laugh with them, dance with them, feed with them even. Many and various are the attempts to pass the time pleasantly which only bore us to death. Can any one of us lay our hands on our hearts and say that we go to any of these assemblages with pleasure or that we are not intensely dull when we are in the midst of them? And yet we go to all; to dreary dinners, to stuffy, crowded rooms, to indifferent music, to tedious readings, to tiresome gossips about people for whom we care absolutely nothing. "Pause," as the ranters are fond of saying, "pause and ask thyself why?" Is it to please ourselves? Emphatically no. Is it to please the giver of the entertainment? No; for we do not generally care for the pleasure or displeasure of our acquaintances. Is it that we may be seen there? No, again; for the people that go to a house for the only reason that "everybody" goes, get what they want in being seen there and cannot be classed with the genuine sufferers from boredom. The fact is we have got into a groove and cannot get out for want of moral courage and moral energy. An organized strike for any particular form of social entertainment would perhaps not succeed, seeing that it would be difficult to get any three people to agree as to what they would strike for.

We would therefore make two practical suggestions. The first is, that no excuse should be necessary in refusing an invitation and that no more offense should be taken at a refusal without excuse than there is when a lady whom we know to be at home declines to receive. The second is that all young couples who have the happiness not yet to have entered the dreary treadmill of society's listless joys, should give their minds and a portion of their time experimentally to making their homes pleasant in some sensible, unfashionable, unconventional way, well within instead of outside their means, to a limited number of their friends. The more original the plan they hit upon and the more they enjoy it themselves, the more likely they will be to succeed. Each house would thus become a centre of some individuality, and would be consequently more interesting and amusing. We wish it to be distinctly understood that we are by no means advising young wives to set up salons. The social talent required for a successful salon is not possessed by one woman in a thousand, and imitations are always dull things. And moreover, the husband of a woman who has that art gradually becomes a nonentity, and the house is no longer a happy home for him and his children, but a shrine for the worship of his wife by all his acquaintances. Lastly, let us have a more liberal allowance of fun at our dinner parties. Is it not enough to work hard all day? Must a man be doomed to punch his unhappy brains all dinner-time as well, in order to keep up a grave controversy on politics or theology—like a "last lamented" journalist, whom we once heard discussing the doctrine of the Trinity throughout the dinner? How much better employed he would have been in cracking jokes. He might have been living now.—London Week.

Titled American Belles.

As I look upon the gay Boulevard des Capucines and note some fair faces in the stylish carriages passing, and recollect that once they were the admiration of a broad and also a very narrow American circle "at home," and when I recall their native names, now lost under foreign titles, I am amazed at what the Cockney landlady in the play calls "the hups and the downs." It is a source of much inward wormwood and gall to some of us to behold these fair ones lost to American citizenship and lolling under French coronets. But love is sometimes blind and sometimes very much wide awake, and when the latter, not even a ducal or a baronial title will cause the most independent American republican girl to blink. Look at the list, even in my momentary memory of our "republican court" belles: The Duchess de Praslin Choiseul is a charming, stately lady, well known in Baltimore society; the Countess Charette is one of a family whose name is a household word in Tennessee, and identified with the polished period of a presidency of the United States when "grand and gracious manners marked men of court." No higher links of royal alliances can there be found in France than those of Mme. Charette by her French marriage, even if you look down the avenue of great personages as far as you will and back again to the venerable Duchess of St. James, the grandmother of Mme. Charette's step children. Yet those who can recall the person of our simple-bearing Democrat, President Polk, little dream that on the banks of the Seine dwells his favorite niece, surrounded by the royalists of the Bourbon and Legitimist schools, and she the most charming of them all, crowned with womanly virtues, the true pride of an American lady. And from the "Crescent City" came a belle of rare qualities and womanly beauties, whose name, as the lovely Mme. Dampier, few of us will forget, when refined taste and exquisite surroundings are the topics of our talk. I might say something of the Marchioness d'Hurseie, of New York, and that old group of the Livingston-Power society, but for the present I remain silent. I might also say something of another sister who became the Princess Lanti and made a mark in society at Rome, but then I should have to speak of a third sister who became the Marchioness Garotti and the adopted daughter-in-law of the late Pope Pio Nono, and as I am not disposed to dwell on details I simply allude to these names formally to show the attraction of our belles to the gallants abroad and point to the failures of our beaus at home. Here I might also say something of a lovely niece of the foregoing three ladies, who became the Countess Sala and graced the salons of Paris and Turin as well as of Naples and Rome, but space forbids the pleasure. How much, in the way of challenging our home gallants, can be said when the names of the Countess de Damas and her sister, who married an Italian prince, are alluded to. Both in Baltimore and New York the family pedigree and pious family examples of the fair and fortunate ones is gratefully known. So, too, that of the Countess Montauban, and now that Miss Hungerford, of California, is added to the list of foreign-titled American belles, as—I mentioned in my last letter, it is a source of some laudable and anxious curiosity to know who comes next? "Why," I say to my "Monumental City" fair companion, "do not some of our American men come over here and marry a princess or two, just by way of revenge?" She: "Do you see that little maiden with a big Normandy cap, dark blue stockings, bright colored kerchief and with her violet blue eyes and sweet, artless smile—even she would not marry other than a Frenchman!" Why have our girls not the same patriotism?—Baltimore Sun Paris Letter.

Fashion Notes.

NOVELTIES in feathers are ostrich feathers with camel's hair tips.

PROMINENT among the new spring fabrics is the Hungarian, a soft cashmere in the new linchen and fawn shades.

CRESCENTS and horseshoes are the most fashionable designs for what are called sprigged muslins.

NEW walking boots for ladies have pointed toes, and are much higher in the ankle than formerly.

IMPORTED wraps are of light camel's hair, of peculiar shape, and are trimmed with crepe fringe.

VERY large flowers are used in millinery this spring, a single rose in many cases forming the crown of a bonnet.

HANDSOME fringes are of chenille, narrow silk braids arranged in complicated patterns, and cut beads mixed with both braids and chenille tassels.

WE have this season a reproduction of pale tints, more neutral and paler than ever, cloudy blues, whitish greens, purplish tints, etc. The dark tint that is most popular is the bleu gendarme.

THE favorite flowers for tacking on bonnet crowns are asters, marguerites, pansies and eglantine blossoms, with the yellow anthers showing plainly in the delicate pink ground of petals.

WITH the summer, sleeves short to the elbow will become very general, and the very long glove of unglazed kid will be worn with it, and further on in the summer the fine thread glove and the silk netting or lace mitten.

IT is not easy to regard the striped and elaborately decorated feminine stockings as altogether a modest or refined fashion. The ladies tell us that these expensive and frequently flashy articles are necessary for the present low open shoes. Probably; but they have been hanging at the store windows all winter, and must have been bought by somebody before the low shoes could have been worn with comfort. And the mode is going from bad to worse. The Boccaccio stocking in out in Vienna. The peculiarity of a pair of Boccaccio stockings is that one is black and the other white. The idea came from the stage, from a comic opera, but is now the fashion of the drawing-room.

A PRETTY spring costume for a young lady is of gendarme-blue Indian cashmere. The bodice forms a tight-fitting cuirass, finished at the waist by a deep fluting of satin-striped pekin foulard, which forms a basque; in front there is a waistcoat of plaited pekin foulard, fastened across by three tabs. The skirt, of cashmere, is trimmed around the bottom with a fluting twelve inches deep. Draperies of pekin foulard are crossed over in front of the skirt, forming paniers at the sides; these come down very much at the back, and are joined together in the middle in an enormous bow, with fringed ends, close to the heading of the fluting around the bottom.

To be Remembered.

It is with life as with coffee: He who drinks it pure must not drain it to the dregs.

The rich are more envied by those who have little than by those who have nothing.

It is the work of a philosopher to be every day subduing his passions and laying aside his prejudices.

Having nothing to do with any man in a passion, for men are not like iron, to be wrought out when hot.

Whosoever would work wisely and with success must have clearly before him the end he wishes to accomplish.

It is a most mortifying reflection to any man to consider what he has done compared with what he might have done.

If you would be pungent be brief; for it is with words as with sunbeams the more they are condensed the deeper they burn.

Our eyesight is the more exquisite of our senses, yet it does not serve us to discern wisdom; if it did, what a glow of love would she kindle within us.—Plato.

Vineland, New Jersey, has ten thousand inhabitants and one police officer; it reported one crime last year, and its pauper expenses amounted to four dollars. There is no grog shop in Vineland.

I have never been able to discover that a man is at all the worst for being attacked. One foolish line of his own does him more harm than the ablest pamphlet against him by other people.—Macaulay.

Good words do more than hard speeches; as the sunbeams without any noise will make the traveler cast off his cloak, which all the blustering winds could not do, but only make him bend it closer to him.—Leighton.

Strange Freak of a Dove.

For more than a week a beautiful white dove of the tumbler variety has followed Conductor Smith's freight train on the Old Colony railroad daily from Walpole to a certain spot in Medfield, Mass., where it alights on a particular barn, reappearing the the next day at the same place in Walpole. During a part of the way the dove flies just back of the cab, under the pillar of smoke, and within a few feet of the engineer, and a part of the way beside the engineer's window and with two feet of his hand as he stretches it toward her. Occasionally she falls back to the rear of the train, as if surveying it, but only to resume her wonted place a moment later. The engineer has tried several times to run away from the beautiful bird by putting on extra steam, but to no purpose. When the train passes under a bridge the dove mounts gracefully above it, tumbling immediately to its place again on the other side.—Boston Advertiser.

THERE is no beautiful spring at Niagara. It is all fall there.

Chinese Rice Paper.

Everybody is familiar with those brilliant, quaint pictures of insects, birds and flowers painted upon a thick, soft, translucent material we have always called "rice paper." This is not made of rice. It is the thin slices of the pith of a plant or tree of the Aralia family, fatsia papyrifera of modern botanists. The tree grows about twenty feet high, and its pith is an extensive article of commerce in China, for it is used in the manufacture of many articles, especially toys and artificial flowers. The cylinder of pith exposed on removing the bark and woody fibre is rarely an inch and a half in diameter, and, as the substance is delicate and tender, rare skill and practice are required to cut the whole stick from circumference to centre into one continuous sheet. A long, thin, very sharp knife is used for this operation. The largest sheets that can be obtained in this way are about fifteen inches long by ten wide. As soon as the sheets are cut they are spread out, all the little holes are carefully mended with bits of mica, and they are pressed under weights until dry. The refuse scraps, etc., go to make pillows, the ordinary sheets are dyed brilliantly and sold to the flower makers, while the largest sheets are destined for the foreign market, after being carefully painted by skillful native artists. There is no substance yet discovered that so well represents the delicate texture of the petals of flowers as this paper of pith, and it is exported to some extent by artificial flower manufacturers. The tree could no doubt be grown here as our climate is much like that of China.

One of the most interesting things to be seen in China is the daily flower fair in a certain street in Pekin. Stretching along the narrow street for more than half a mile is a grand exposition of pith, paper and silk flowers. Foreigners stand fascinated before the stands, watching the skill of the flower-makers. Each one is provided with an assortment of saucers, knives and some pith paper of many hues. In a short time, while his deft fingers move with bewildering rapidity, he will counterfeit the dahlia, aster, rose or whatever real flower lies before him for a model. His skill in cutting, leaf calyx and petals is equalled only by his marvelous eye for delicate difference of tint. Here the peddlers get their supplies for the day. It is astonishing to see how fond the people are of these beautiful counterfeits of nature. The Chinese women wear no bonnets or hats but do their hair up in elaborate fashion and and wear flowers instead. In some parts of the kingdom you may know if a woman be maid, widow or matron by the color of the flowers she wears in her hair. The parasol, where the women wear no hats, is of course an indispensable article for any outdoor excursion, and the whole family of parasols and umbrellas in China is a marvel. They are generally made of silk or paper, and are often chef d'oeuvres of art.

$3,000 for Three hours' Work.

A picture of a beautiful model which the late Thomas Couture painted in three hours and forty minutes, was bought by a Russian for $3,000. His picture of a Roman scene, painted in 1847, made him instantly a man of power and fame in art. "What are you going to commence now?" asked on of his pupils at that time; "what new grand work?" "I'll tell you," answeren Couture; "my ambition is to paint a glass of water standing on a polished piece of marble. In the glass will be a beautiful rose with a dewdrop upon it, and in the marble you will see the reflection." "But you are not serious?" exclaimed the youth. "After what you have accomplished you must continue." "Yes, I am serious. I wish to make a fortune. To work for glory and die of hunger is not my ambition." Couture became rich, not by his own industry, but by the death of his father and a small fortune brought him by his wife. After years of separation the questioning pupil visited him in his home to see what his master had accomplished in the past years. "Come with me," Couture, after the usual compliments had been exchanged; "come with me and I will show you something beautiful—something I have been painting for the fete of my wife. "Look there!" It was a rose in a glass of water, reflected in the piece of white marble on which it was standing, "Ah, I know it!" cried the pupil. "Know it! Impossible! It was only painted yesterday." "Yes, I have known it since 1847." It was the ambitious conception which had entered his head thirty years before, after he had been proclaimed victor.—New York Tribune.

A Good Story, Though a Little Profane.

Next week Mr. Jerome Hopkins, an eccentric man, and a very poor musician, proposes to bring out a biblical opera called "Samuel." It has been played once, and was generally laughed at, some years ago. The organist of Trinity church told me, some days ago, a very funny story about his first performance of "Samuel," which is worth repeating, although it is a little profane. At the first performance Hopkins induced some of the Trinity choir boys to take part, and the role of the Samuel was taken by a little fellow of the choir who had a beautiful voice. When the night of the opera came, the house was full of people ready to laugh. The orchestra tuned up, and Hopkins sat in the conductor's chair, waiting for the signal "ready" to be given from behind the curtain. But no signal came, and Hopkins got impatient. He bounced on the stage, and soon found that every one was in place except Samuel, who was nowhere to be found. "I'll find him," says Hopkins in a rage, dashing behind the scenes. The next thing the very proper Trinity choir boys heard was Hopkins' voice shouting out: "Where in h-ll is Samuel?" This beginning of a biblical opera rather demoralized the company.—New York Letter in Indianapolis News.

"Drawing Out the Fear."

"I witnessed a beautiful and touching incident," says Owen in his 'Here and There in Portugal' illustrative of the early lessons which make the peril of the future occupation familiar to a child from his cradle, in a little scene on the banks of the Douro. "A fisherman and his wife stood at the waters side, opposite to a deep and dangerous spot. Their child, a boy of about a year old, was already habited in the costume of his future life, that of a sailor, the trousers tucked up above the child's knees. Leading him towards the river's brink, the mother purposely wet his tiny feet. He was alarmed and clung to her. With soft and affectionate caresses, again and again she led him to the water, until the little imp, emboldened by her encouragement, ventured down alone, and, only just able to walk, tottered unsteadily to the stream. I trembled at the risk. Just a few feet further and the water deepened dangerously. But there was no cause for fear. Guided by a watchful eye, the mother's hand was ever ready to catch the little scrap of infant humanity, just in time to save it, and to render my half-uttered exclamation unnecessary: Que esta fasendo? (What is she doing?) Esta de tiando omedo (she is drawing out his fear) was the reply."

CHINESE MENDICANTS.

Begging Reduced to a Science.

Mr. J. H. Gregg, of Hong Kong, has recently written to a London paper a very interesting letter on Chinese beggars. Certainly some of the accounts of these mendicants are horrible in the extreme, and would hardly be credited if the authority was not so good. He says that he has actually seen one beggar bearing on his back a leper so much affected by the disease that his ears and hands and feet were apparently sloughing off. With this loathsome burden, Mr. Gregg says the beggar threatened to enter each shop he passed, unless the shopkeeper at once administered to his wants. Alms were promptly thrown into the street, and quickly picked up. Others, according to this account, go about carrying sharp Chinese razors, with which they cut themselves to show their misery, and to extort alms. Mr. Gregg has seen mendicants with the upper part of their bodies covered with blood. At the town of Pitkong, in the Province of Canton, he saw a beggar literally bathed in his own blood, which also sprinkled over the floor of the shop in which he was trying to melt the apparently obdurate heart of the shopkeeper. He also relates horrible stories of beggars who vary the above fashion by knocking their heads against the walls of shops, and of others who beat their bodies with large stones for the edification of passers-by. Not content with these pleasant and entertaining exhibitions, some of the more emaciated have an agreeable habit of apparently appearing in a dying condition on the threshold of a shop or dwelling-house, and announcing, in dismal tones, their purpose of remaining there to die. Here is Mr. Gregg's account of one instance: "In May, 1874, I saw one, apparently perishing from hunger, throw himself down at the doorway of a dwelling-house, saying that he would die of starvation if he were not immediately relieved. The householder, who was in a great state of trepidation, at once offered the starving man a small sum of money, which was indignantly refused. A friend who was with me expressed his readiness to relieve the wants of the sufferer. He held out a half dollar, and the penurions householder at once rushed toward him, and eagerly grasped the coin, which he at once gave to the sufferer." This letter goes to show that the mendicants of European countries and the United States have not begun to master the fine art of begging, and that they are as yet but in their infancy when compared with the almond-eyed children of the Flowery Land.

The March of the Chinese.

The first Chinaman arrived at San Francisco in 1847, and lost no time in joining the throng of gold hunters who had gone into the mountains. He found enough of the yellow dross to delight his almond-shaped eyes, and stir a fever in his Mongolian blood. The year following, he wrote to some friends in the Flowery Kingdom of his auriferous luck, and the excitement was as great as it could be among the reposeful Celestials. They began coming to our shores, and in three years some 4,000 had entered the Golden Gate, of whom more than one-half tarried in the Californian metropolis. Then the first of the Six Companies was organized, with a view to controlling the immigration of their countrymen and making it profitable to those of their number who had already settled in the new land. In less than 10 years the Chinese population had appropriated an area of some 30 acres of that city, a good part of which had been orignally devoted to fine residences, churches, and hotels. That quarter, now known as Chinatown, contains at present 40,000 Mongolians or nearly one-fifth of the whole number in the United States. Of these, only some 2,000 are women, or 1 to 15 men, a disproportion that has put a premium on Chinese women, and produced a condition of society entirely phenomenal in the Republic. The denizens of Chinatown are not remarkable for versatility, at least so far as their callines are indicative. More than 15,000 are servants, cigar makers, or sewers of clothing, and many are laundrymen. But they all work hard, and are, are therefore, terribly dangerous to the hoodlums and the Irish.

A Powerful Intellect.

Further proof of Sir Walter Scott's wonderful mental powers is afforded by the statements of his friend and publisher James Ballantyne. The novel "Lucy of Lammermoor" was produced under pressure of severe illness, and when Scott was at least in this sense unconscious, and nothing of what he said and did in connection with the work was remembered when he recovered. "The book," said James Ballantyne, "was not only written, but published, before Mr. Scott was able to rise from his bed; and he assured me that, when it was first put into his hands in a complete shape, he did not recollect one single, character or conversation it contained! He did not desire me to understand, nor did I understand, that his illness had erased from his memory the original incidents of the story, with which he had been acquainted from his boyhood; but he literally recollected nothing else—not a single character woven by the romancer, not one of the many scenes and points of humor, not anything with which he was himself connected, as the writer of the work."

JUGURTHA.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
Cried the African monarch, the splendid,
As down to his death in the hollow
Dark dungeons of Rome he descended,
Uncrowned, unthroned, unattended;
How cold are thy baths, Apollo!

How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
Cried the poet, unknown, unbefriended,
As the vision, that lured him to follow,
With the mist and the darkness blended,
And the dream of his life was ended;
How cold are thy baths, Apollo!

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

J. P. SANDERSON, chief elephant catcher in India, has caught ninety-four elephants since his arrival at Mysore in December. Four men of the elephant-catching force have been killed.

THE Bronte sisters are buried within the walls of Haworth church, in ordinary graves dug in the ground beneath the altar door. When the old church is pulled down these graves will have to be despoiled.

PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW has had a gift of a pen made from the iron fetters of Bonivard, the prisoner of Chillon. The socket is made of gold set with three rare gems, and the handle is a piece of oak from the old frigate Constitution.

HAVING heard of Cyrus W. Field's intention to erect a monument to Major Andre, the Bridgeport, Conn., St. George's society, all Englishmen, have subscribed $50 toward a monument for Nathan Hale, the young American who was hanged by the British during the revolution.

ONE gentleman of New York is said to have sent $1,000 to an English friend to put on Parole, at best advantage. That $1,000 netted him $55,000, the bet having been made when the odds were one to fifty-six against Parole. Lorillard must have won $800,000.

THE late Judge Barnard, of New York was about five feet ten inches high. He had glittering black eyes, a pale face, and was slender. He wore very large diamond studs, and a flashing solitaire ring, said to have cost $7,000. He wore shirts with frilled bosoms, diamond sleeve buttons, gorgeous scarfs, a velvet coat, and in winter a sealskin overcoat.

LORD CHELMSFORD is said to be the saddest man in Africa. The rout at Isandula was so sudden and complete that Lord Chelmsford lost the whole of his baggage, including his stars and orders—a misfortune which seems to be viewed in the colony with ill-disguised satisfaction. It is evident that this unlucky general and Sir Bartle Frere are two of the most detested men in Africa. —London Truth.

ORISON BLOUNT, well known in local politics of New York city before and during the war, died recently. During the war he invented a gun which discharged 70 shots a minute, the gun being operated by a crank and the ammunition being shoved into it. The government bought it, but in the first battle where it was used the gun fell into the hands of the rebels. The weapon was the veritable ancestor of the Gatling gun and the French mitrailleuse.

FOREIGN honors are crowding thickly on Americans. Dr. Charles Rau, archæologist of the Smithsonian Institution, has recently been elected a member of the Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries at Copenhagen. Recently he received his diploma of membership, signed by the King of DenTark, as president of the society. Prof. J. Lawrence Smith, the eminent American chemist, of Louisville, Ky., has also just been elected a member of the Academy of Sciences of France.

MR. BANCROFT, the historian, seems very feeble this spring. He was out riding his favorite black steed recently, but seemed so weak and nervous that I feared he could not reach home in safety, although accompanied by a stalwart groom, who rode close to his master. One year ago the old gentleman, clad in a close, trim fitting riding suit, his white hair and long snowy beard surmounted by a cap with a vizor, used to dash by on his spirited horse with the impetuous pleasure of youth, and now he can hardly sit erect, although clinging to the saddle's pommel for support.—Washington Letter.

LONDON Truth, in an article giving anecdotes of the Prince of Wales, says: "He is fond of late hours, but no matter how late he may go to bed, he rises early the next morning. He is a keen sportsman and a very fair shot. At whist he plays an excellent hand. And whether the occupation of the moment be whist, sport or dancing, he enters into it with a hearty relish, which contrasts strangely with the blase airs of the golden youths of the day. His constitution is an excellent one. He rarely has a day's illness, and he is a living proof that no amount of tobacco can enfeeble either mind or body. I believe that he was the inventor of the now popular drink, 'lemon and soda.'"

The South American Belligerents.

The following account of the forces of the belligerents in the war now going on in South America is given in a letter from La Paz to a German paper: "Peru, with a superficial area greater than that of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and a population of 2,700,000, has four ironclads (a frigate, a ram, and two monitors), six wooden ships, three training ships, five river steamers, and an army of 3,000 men only on a peace footing, but with the cadres of eight battalions of infantry, three regiments of cavalry, and two brigades of artillery, besides 1,000 gendarmes, and 1,200 watchmen (vigilantes). Chili, with a population of 2,117,000, has two good ironclad corvettes and four wooden war steamers, besides some other ships which are unserviceable for war purposes. The armament of the Chilian navy consists of forty-four guns, and the personnel of 973 men. The Chilian army comprises 1,500 infantry, 1,200 cavalry, and 410 artillery, besides 6,000 national guards. Bolivia has no navy, and her army consists of 2,000 men; but it could easily be increased by the system of recruiting prevalent in the country, under which young and strong men are torn from their families to serve in the army. The population of Bolivia is 2,325,000."

"The Initiated Tramp."

[Napoleon Northwest.]

ED. NORTHWEST:—Please publish the following for the benefit of the masses:

We have long since maintained that the tramps scouring about the country are a regularly organized fraternity, having a general understanding with one another and having a ritual of questions and answers. Their uniform appearance, their periodical visits to the same localities, their regular calls at the same house where they have before secured food, all point to this. A sheriff of a western county has found curious emblems about them, has studied their character and listened to their conversation, until he can tell a regularly initiated tramp from an imposter. The following amusing and instructive dialogue took place between the sheriff and one of a squad of tramps recently committed to jail:

"From whence came you?"

"From a town in New York, called Jerusalem."

"What's your business here?"

"To learn to subdue my appetite, and to sponge my living from an indulgent public."

"Then you are a regular tramp, I presume?"

"I am so taken and accepted wherever I go."

"How am I to recognize you as tramp?"

"By the largeness of my feet and general carnivorous appearance."

"How do you know yourself to be a tramp?"

"In seeking food by being often denied, but ready to try again."

"How gained you admittance to this town?"

"By a good many long tramps."

"How were you received?"

"On the end of a policeman's billy, presented to my head."

"How did the policeman dispose of you?"

"He took me several times around the town to the south, east and west, where he found the city marshal, police judge and the jailer, where a great many questions were asked."

"What advice did the judge give you?"

"He advised me to walk in upright, regular steps, and to renounce tramping——"

"Will you be off or from?"

"With your permission I'll be off very quickly."

"Which way are you traveling?"

"East."

"Of what are you in pursuit?"

"Work—which, by my own endeavors and the assistance of others, I hope I shall never be able to find."

My friend, you are now at an institution where the wicked are always troublesome, and the weary as bad as the rest. You will now be conducted to the middle chamber by a flight of winding stairs, consisting of five or more steps, instead of corn, wine and oil—the wages of the ancients—yours will be bread and water for five days. When your company escape from this place, divide yourselves into parties of three each, take a bee line for Portland or Bangor, where, in the winter they usually run free soup houses, and you may be pardoned on condition of your never returning. ***

FLORIDA, April 21st, 1879.

Turned the Tables.

A lawyer in Dayton, Ohio, had in his office a particularly industrious student One of the clients was a young and pretty woman, and her consultations with the lawyer were always held in his private room, behind closed doors. The student became anxious to learn about the case that required so much secret discussion. He peeped and listened at the keyhole, and was rewarded by the knowledge that, while the legal business related to the collection of a small debt, most of the interviews were devoted to courtship. The lawyer desired the woman to marry him, while she being wealthy feared that his motive was mercenary. On the occasion of her next call the lawyer was not in, and the student politely informed her that, although he had not been admitted to the bar, he was confident that he could deal satisfactorily with her case. She said no, but he persisted, popped the question on the spot, urged his suit eloquently, and was accepted. The lawyer, in revenge tried to whip him, and that was how the story got out.

Strange Cure for Malignant Fever.

A correspondent writes as follows: "The vapor arising from the custom of melting tallow with red hot tongs, practiced in Scotland in making candles, has been found by accident to be most efficacious in cases of malignant and epidemical fevers. A merchant of Peterhead, was attacked by a fever, of which his brother died, and when apparently hopelessly sick, and in a fainting state and violently agitated, the process of making candles was going on, and the smoke reached his bed. The smell of burning tallow, offensive in ordinary cases, was agreeable to him, took away his sickness and tranquilized his nerves. When the business was over his complaint again recommenced, when he caused tallow to be again burned, and the effluvium again relieved him. By repeating this simple and extraordinary remedy for three days he became perfectly well."

Why Will You

Allow a cold to advance in your system and thus encourage more serious maladies, such as Pneumonia, Hemorrhages and Lung troubles when an immediate relief can be so readily attained. Boschee's German Syrup has gained the largest sale in the world for the cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung Diseases. It is Dr. Boschee's famous German prescription, and is prepared with the greatest care, and no fear need be entertained in administering it to the youngest child, as per directions. The sale of this medicine is unprecedented. Since first introduced there has been a constant increasing demand and without a single report of a failure to do its work in any case. Ask your Druggist as to the truth of these remarks. Large size 75 cents. Try it and be convinced. Sold by C. H. Hoyt, Auburn, Ind.

An Ithica girl has painted fifty black satin buttons, to ornament a dress for herself, with a pretty design, either a bit of wheat, a bee, or a dainty flower, while around the cuffs and down the front of the dress, from throat to hem, run interlaced clusters of lilies of the valley, with here and there a humming bird in color and form as natural as life A necklace made in the same manner is also to be worn. The painting is all on a ground-work of black satin, and is delicately and deftly done.

A Hard Case.

A Woodward avenue druggist yesterday put up a prescription brought by a boy, and as he handed over the bottle the boy asked:

"Did you put any sugar in it?"

"I don't think I did," was the reply.

"Well, then, I don't believe ma'll touch a drop of it. I got some medicine here 'tother day and pa couldn't even hire her to take it, 'cause it wasn't sweet. She's purty sick, but she's down on medicine."

"Well, how does your father manage?"

"He don't manage at all. He tries to hire mother, but you see she's too old to care for candy and too young to want spectacles or a snuff box, and there we are, you see. If them onion draughts on her feet don't do any good I'll bet I'll have a stepmother 'fore fall."—Detroit Free Press.

A Corpse Weighing 980 Pounds.

[Harrisburg Patriot.]

Benjamin Singerly, formerly proprietor of the State Journal, and printer for a term of years, who died suddenly after traveling from Philadelphia to Pittsburg one hot day about two years ago, was a very heavy man, weighing from 350 to 400 pounds. He was interred at Pittsburg. A few weeks ago the relatives of Mr. Singerly made preparations to have him resurrected and taken to Philadelphia, where his parents and other relatives are buried. When the persons to whom the work was intrusted had dug down to the top of the casket, they were suprised to find that no offensive odor prevailed. The rough box was opened but the attempt to remove the casket from it was ineffectual on account of its extraordinary weight. When the lid was removed the face and body were found to have undergone petrifaction—they had assumed the color of yellow marble, and the entire face and form seemed like one mass of marble chiseled from a block—not one of the features or lineaments being out of place or unnatural in the slightest degree. The body was raised from the grave by means of a block and fall, and was found to weigh when weighed for transportation to Philadelphia, nine hundred and eighty pounds!

How a Toad Undresses.

[New York Graphic.]

"About the middle of July I found a toad on a hill of melons, and not wanting him to leave, I hoed around him. He appeared sluggish and not inclined to move. Presently I observed him pressing his elbows against his sides and rubbing downward. He appeared so singular that I watched to see what he was up to. After a few smart rubs his skin began to burst open straight along his back. Now, said I, old fellow you have done it; but he appeared to be unconcerned, and kept on rubbing until he had worked all his skin into folds on his sides and hips; then grasping one hind leg with both his hands, he hauled off one leg of his pants, the same as any body would, then stripped the other hind leg in the same way. He then took his cast-off cuticle forward between his fore legs into his mouth and swallowed it; then, by raising and lowering his head, swallowing as his head came down he stripped of the skin underneath until it came down to his forelegs, and then grasping one of these with the opposite hand, by considerable pulling, stripped off the skin; changing hands, he stripped the other, and by a slight motion of the head, and all the while swallowing, he drew it from the neck and swallowed the whole. The operation seemed an agreeable one, and occupied but a short time.

Little Women.

[Liberal Review.]

Little women are prone to fascinate big men, but perhaps they have a considerable amount of power over men in general. But they are endowed with no such power for witchery so far as their sisters are concerned. Indeed, there is a certain amount of chronic antagonism between little women and other women, which prevents them from fraternizing together with that cordiality with which women who are in no way physically remarkable can. The ordinary woman will, probably, tell you, if you appeal to her for an opinion, that the little woman "is a conceited little thing that gives herself all manner of airs and graces." The statement may not be quite correct, but those who generally make it have good cause for belief in its accuracy. The little woman is in the habit of treating them with a degree of scorn, not to say contempt, which is calculated to have a most irritating effect upon their nerves. The constant contemplation of her own insignificance has ruffled her temper, though her very smallness is in some cases a point in her favor rather than against it. But constant fighting, even if it is only shadows, has a decidedly exasperating tendency. Now she is continually doing battle with what she and some others may be disposed to consider her weak point. It is easy to see how keenly she feels the sting of being small. She not only assumes an aggressive attitude toward a great portion of humanity on that account; she allows the fact to influence her in the matter of taste and her every-day life. If she has a house she will have every thing in it on as big a scale as possible; she will love big horses and big dogs; she will, as we have already said, probably marry a big man, and she will, in a variety of other ways, indicate her affection for the magnificent as compared with the insignificant. All this may be regarded as a sort of protest on her part against her own littleness. It is another proof that people would like to be just what they are not, and to get just what they lack. Though her foibles and eccentricities are many, she can be forgiven them in view of their causes. At the same time she may be recommended to make herself more agreeable if she were less egotistical and aggressive. Perhaps we should say that we have spoken of typical little women, not of all little women.

Portable Mulay Saw Mill,

With improvements recently made is unequaled as a neighborhood mill. It can be run by either steam or water power, and is especially adapted to the engines used for threshing.

It may be operated by either two or three men, and will cut as much lumber in proportion to the power and number of hands employed as mills of larger capacity.

It makes smooth and even lumber, leaves no stubshot and will cut any sized log up to four feet in diameter. It may be transported from one locality to another and re-erected ready for sawing in from two to three days, and can be made profitable in localities where there is not sufficient timber to justify the erection of a large mill. Send for descriptive circular, price, etc., to CHANDLER & TAYLOR, Indianapolis, Ind.

A Glass Dress.

Prof. Theodore Greiner, a patient glassblower of an inventive turn of mind, has after four months of untiring labor, produced a marvel in the shape of a lady's dress, woven—trimmings and all—from strands of glass spun by him. The wonder was produced in the basement of the residence of S. Isaacs, No. 1434 Mission st, a gentleman who was struck with the phenomenal powers of Prof. Greiner in weaving glass some years ago, while the latter was in New Orleans, and who went into partnership with him. The spinning was done by blowing glass into long strands, and washing them in a solution of water and beet-root sugar, which has a toughening effect. The weaving was done on an old-fashioned hand-loom, the warp being nineteen feet long, and the woof four feet; a number of colors being worked in, and producing a beautiful bright glass cloth. The dress was made by Lottie Hoff, a dressmaker, who was occupied five days in cutting and making the costume. The dress is en panier, with loop sleeves and square neck, ornamented with box-pleatings, and bound in blue. The garments are soon to be put on exhibition, and will form one of the curiosities of the day. In 1863, Prof. Greiner spun and wove a dress entirely of glass, for which he was offered $2,500, but put it upon exhibition, and it was soon cut to pieces by persons who desired specimens. With the new dress there is a set of beautiful blonde glass curls of a natural hue upon the head of the model, reaching to the waist. Prof. Greiner is a native of Bohemia, and belongs to a family of glass-blowers. His latest achievement, however, is considered to be far superior to the common and well-known achievements of exhibiting glass-blowers. In the bright light of three or four gas-jets the glass dress presents a most beautiful appearance, glistening at every point, and falling over the form with the grace of silk. It can be removed and put on with little more trouble than an ordinary dress.—San Francisco Call.

Better Late Than Never.

[Scientific American.]

In is not an uncommon thing to hear young men complain that their early schooling was deficient in quantity, poor in quality, or—if neither of these—was wasted through boyish indifference and folly. They would get on better in life if they knew more, they are free to admit, but they do not see that they are daily wasting opportunities which, if improved, would in a few years give them a fairly good eduction. They think themselves too old to learn, and spend more time regretting their lack of knowledge than would suffice to give them the knowledge they need. It is said that the father of Professor Sumner, of Yale College could neither write nor read when he came to this country, a young English mechanic. Within twenty years thereafter he was known as one of the best read men in Hartford, one of the most cultivated communities in the country. Instead of wasting his time in idle regrets for his deficient schooling, he learned to read, and read to good purpose. In a similar way many of the best, most honored, and most successful men our country has known, have begun their acquaintance with letters after reaching manhood; and there is no reason why the most illiterate mechanic in our land, if possessed of natural ability and a sincere purpose, may not increase his enjoyment in life, his opportunities for improving his social and financial condition, and the chances of his family for the highest success in life, by an honest effort to retrieve by study the disadvantages by which early poverty or lack of educational opportunities has surrounded him.

should allow no other to go into their fields. It is cheaper to employ the Aultman-Taylor to do your work at regular prices than to have it done for nothing by an Endless Apron Thresher. Why complain of the extortion of Railroad [illegible] allowing Endless Apron Threshers to waste your substance year after year? Read in the Aultman-Taylor pamphlet what the leading farmers in America think, and hereafter employ the Aultman-Taylor [illegible]. By doing so get several bushels more grain out of a field than you ever did before. Why allow an Endless Apron Thresher to carry out your wheat into the stack with the straw (where its only use is to fatten chickens) instead of into your half bushel measure? If you want fat chickens you can better afford to buy them in New York (if there was no better way) than to fatten them by employing an Endless Apron Thresher. Now that the shrewdest, most money-making farmers have thrown the Endless Apron Thresher overboard, and permit none but the Aultman-Taylor style to do their work, why will any intelligent farmer longer submit to seeing his money (in the shape of grain) deposited by an Endless Apron Thresher on his straw stack, instead of in a Savings Bank?

Economical Grain-Saving Work

OF THE

Aultman-Taylor Thresher.

To parties about to buy Threshing Machinery: Buy the machine which your customers prefer—The Aultman-Taylor. Buy the machine which will make you most money by giving you the choice of jobs, the longest run of work and which will add to your reputation as a Thresherman. Instead of buying the old style condemned pattern machine, which is rapidly falling behind, buy the Aultman-Taylor, which every year makes such wonderful strides in public favor. A Threshing Machine lasts a number of years, and as people (especially farmers and those who employ machines) are rapidly waking up to the merits of the grain-saving Aultman-Taylor Thresher and becoming keenly alive to the extravagance of the grain-wasting Endless Apron threshers, is it not foolish to invest either your money, your credit or your reputation in a machine which, for the last few years of its life, is likely to lie in your barn or out in the field, entirely useless, because nobody will employ it? Read the hundreds of letters from purchasers of the Aultman-Taylor Thresher, who speak about their success in getting the best of the jobs, the largest prices for work and of being busy threshing months after all the Endless Apron machines were laid up, and last, but not least, of having threshed for many men who owned Endless Apron machines, but who could not afford to have their own grain wasted—even if they did waste that of the men they threshed for with their Endless Apron machine.

GEN. GRANT'S FOREIGN TOUR.

Interesting Allegations Respecting the Way it has been Managed.

[From the World.]

The methods by which the backers of Grant have [illegible] and prestige of the government of the United States, in order to put foreign nations and foreign municipalities in a position in which it would be next to impossible for them, without incivility to the United States to refuse to extend unusual and elaborate hospitality to Gen. Grant, are likely soon to come to the front in the form of official correspondence.

It will be remembered that Secretary Evarts issued a circular-letter on the subject of the attention proper to be paid to Gen. Grant, to our ministers, consuls, consular agents, and naval officers all over the world. The one for the interpretation of the circular-letter was given by Mr. Pierrepont and Consul-General Badeau, in London, and [illegible] in England [illegible] was established in London, under Consul-General Badeau, a sort of Grant "nine-[illegible]" from which instructions were issued to the American legation or consulate [illegible] it might be arranged that the ex-president should go.

If the place was a political capital, the American legation was told to say at the foreign office that "the government," of the United States would consider itself to be under much obligation to the French, or Italian, or Turkish government, as the case may be, if especial official and popular consideration could be bestowed upon the coming ex-president when he arrived.

If it was only a commercial centre which was to be visited, the American consul there was directed to say the same sort of things to the municipal authorities and to the leading manufacturers and merchants whose invoices might require consular certificates and endorsements.

All these official applications to foreigners for civilities and expenditures to be lavished on Gen. Grant, were as a mere matter of fact, so many drafts drawn by the government at Washington upon foreign countries, or their officials or citizens and subjects, and similar drafts must of course in time be honored at Washington when they are drawn in favor of any personage in Europe or Asia against us.

With European an civilized Asiatic governments, such direct applications made by a nation of the rank of the United States, are of course equivalent to those several letters of introduction which are sometimes disrespectfully described as "soup tickets."

If the power and credit of the United States were to be exerted in a similar manner in his favor, there is not a prominent military officer or civilian in the United States who might not be put before foreigners all over the world in a way to elicit the most distinguished attentions.

The upshot of the whole matter is that Gen. Grant has been kept wandering about Europe and Asia since 1877 as "the government" candidate for re-election.

How the private expenses of his wandering may have been defrayed concerns no one but himself and his friends. Whether it is to the honor and advantage of the country, however, that all these obligations to foreign powers should have been incurred by the people of the United States, through their public servants, in order to promote the candidacy of a particular citizen for the presidency is, however, a matter both proper and important to be considered by the public.

It may be added, by the way, that in one instance at St. Petersburg, the bill of the expenses of a grand picnic and reception tendered Gen. Grant, by the Russian authorities, at the request and solicitation of the American minister, is believed on good authority to have been sent in by them to the American legation and there paid.

Bright Hours and Gloomy.

Ah, this beautiful world! I know not what to make of it. Sometimes it is all gladness and sunshine, and Heaven itself lies not far off; and then it suddenly changes and is dark and sorrowful, and the clouds shut out the day. In the lives of the saddest of us there are bright days, when we feel that we could take the great world in our arms. Then come gloomy hours, when the fire will not burn on our hearth, and all without and within is dismal, cold and damp. Believe me, every heart has its secret sorrow, which the world knows not, and oftentimes we call a man cold when he is only sad.

The Andre Monument.

Mr. Cyrus W. Fild has purchased the land at Tappan, where Major Andre was executed October 2, 1780, and is having prepared to be placed on the same a stone, on the front of which will be inscribed:

Here died October 2, 1780,
Major John Andre, of the Brinish Army, who, entering the American lines on a secret mission to Benedict Arnold for the surrender of West Point, was taken prisoner, tried and condemned
as a spy.
His death,
though according to the stern code of war,
moved even his enemies to pity, and both armies mourned the fate of one so young and so brave.
In 1821 his remains were removed to Westminster Abbey.
A hundred years after his execution a citizen of the States against which he fought placed this stone above the spot where he lay;
Not to perpetuate the record of strife,
But in token of those better sentiments
Which have since united two nations,
One in race, in language, and in religion;
With the earnest hope that this friendly union
Will never be broken.
—Arthur Penrhun Stanley, Dean of Westminster.

THE FIRST LOVE.

An Incident of the Life of Sir Walter Scott.

[New York Cor. Troy Times.]

It is an old saying, "Whom first we love we never wed," and this, though not strictly true, may be applied to Scott, Byron, George Washington, and many other men of note. It is interesting to observe how poets generally present their love matters to the public. The personal experience of such men will crop out. Scott, for instance, fell deeply in love in early life with a girl of aristocratic family, and as he was then merely a poor barrister, there was no prospect of success. His father, knowing this, and being desirous to bring the matter to a close, suggested to the parents the propriety of terminating the acquaintance, and this was done in the least painful manner. The lady was the only daughter of Sir John Stewart, of Forfarshire, and she afterward married Sir William Forbes, the noted Edinburgh banker. As Scott was a well educated young man, of fine personal appearance and agreeable manners, there could be but little reason for giving the banker preference, except his wealth and social rank. Scott felt this keenly through life, and in "Rokeby" he revives the episode at some length. Matilda, the heroine of the poem, represents the object of his early love, who there rejects a poet in favor of one in higher rank, and this scene becomes doubly interesting as a picture of Scott's early experience. In 1811 Lady Forbes died, but she had lived long enough to see the once penniless barrister the first in Scotland. Her death was deeply felt by Scott, for although he had been married for years, the old flame was not extinguished. "Rokeby" appeared the next year, and Lockhart says "that there is nothing wrought out in all Scott's prose more exquisite than the contrast between the rivals for the hand of the heroine." Six years afterward Scott wrote thus to Miss Edgeworth: "Matilda was attempted for the person of a lady who is no more, so that I am flattered with your distinguishing it." As this took place nearly twenty years after the disappointment, it illustrates the tenacity with which the author held to his first love. When Lady Forbes died Scott was so affected that he called on her mother, and both fell to weeping over the sad affair. It is a curious incident in domestic history to see a man carrying his first love so tenderly through life, while married to another woman to whom he always showed great attachment. Scott evidently made Matilda the ideal or dream wife who accompanied him to the last. Having recovered from the worst effects of his disappointment, he met a French girl, whose father had saved both life and fortune by fleeing from the dangers of the revolution. At the time referred to Miss Charpentier (or Carpenter) was an orphan, and to her Scott transferred his affections, as far as this was possible. He appeared, as has been said, much attached to his wife through life, and sincerely mourned her death. She was, however, intellectually and physically inferior to the Scottish ladies of the day, and the rapid degeneracy of the family may in some degree be ascribed to so unfavorable a union.

A SCRAP OF HISTORY.

Why the Regular Army did not Interfere in the Election of 1870.

(From the Union Observer.)

On the 7th of November, 1870, the city of New York was more deeply excited than at any other time in its recent history. It was the day preceding the general election of that year, and orders had gone forth that the metropolis should be invaded by Federal troops, the laws of the state ignored, and the rights of the people placed at the mercy of John I. Davenport and his reckless crowd of supervisors and deputy marshals. In the harbor lay two gunboats, furnished by the notorious Robeson, and threatening to open fire on the business heart of the town.

The State was at perfect peace, and its laws were respected and enforced. No man could vote unless he had appeared in person at the designated places at least ten days before and registered his name, answering under oath the questions which were put in regard to his residence and qualifications. All that the republicans had asked in the way of increased stringency to the election acts had been conceded by the democratic legislature. The inspectors and canvassers had been fairly chosen from both parties, under the direction of a non-partisan police commission. No officer of the state or city, high or low, republican or democrat, had asked for the interference of the federal troops, but an army was there, under command of a Brigadier-General of regulars, to conduct an election.

Never before had such a reckless attempt been made to invade the invested rights of the people, and it is safe to say that it will never be made again. The promptness and bravery with which it was met and repelled by Gov. Hoffman served as a warning to President Grant. The governor repaired to the city, and quietly but firmly announced that if the federal troops appeared in the streets on election day they would be met by the National Guard, who would protect the people at all hazards. This was no idle threat. Ample preparations had been made for a conflict, which seemed at that time inevitable. How ample those preparations were, the following document, which is now made public for the first time, will show:

[Copy.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 7, 1870.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I have the pleasure of informing you that I feel confident of having secured a supply of one hundred thousand ball cartridges, and four hundred rounds of canister shot, with cartridges, for the artillery. God grant that it may not be necessary to use them.

* * * * * * * *

Yours very truly,
FRANKLIN TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

To GOV. HOFFMAN.

Fortunately the threatened necessity did not arise. At the last moment the federal authorities took counsel of discretion, and retreated. Not a federal soldier was seen in the streets of New York on the election day of 1870, and since that time no attempt has been made to invade our state.

A Little Story About the Zulus.

A missionary some years ago preached to the Zulus about hell, and told them how hot it was, and how surely they would go there if they did not change their courses. A Zulu chief, having heard him, invited him to dinner. The meal ended, the chief, says a South African newspaper, turned sharply around to the missionary and said: "What was that you said this morning about putting the great Zulu people in a great fire after they were dead? Come this way and I will show you what the Zulus are; you don't know them, I can see." He took him to a pile of wood, which was of tremendious proportions—as big as a Bay store—and had it set fire to all round. When it was properly in a blaze and gave out so much heat that no one could come near it, the king summoned the two regiments who had listened to the sermon and ordered them to charge in the burning pile and extinguish it. Naked as they were, without shoes or any covering at all, they rushed into the burning mass like madmen, raving and yelling, and did not stop till hardly a vestige of the fire remained. The king then said to the missionary: "You have seen that. That is what we will do with your hell. The Zulu won't play with your fires, and you had better clear out of this country at once, or I will have a "little fire' made for you to put out." The missionary took the hint, and left the kraal the same evening. Is it any wonder, ask the people, after this, that Gatling guns and rocket batteries have no terror for the Zulus? And it is certain they have none. The Zulus, when ordered to attack, attack; and though they may be mowed down by thousands still they come on, until they conquer or die.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

Truth Stranger Than Fiction—Romantic but Fatal Disclosure.

[Dubuque Times.]

A wealthy couple had lived together in perfect peace for forty-one years. While sitting in the parlor one evening not long ago the husband surprised his wife by saying: "I am going to tell you a secret you have never heard before." There was a pause as the lady and a near relative, who chanced to be present, awaited the disclosure, and the husband continued: "Yes you will be surprised to hear that I had another wife before I married you." Startled and aghast, the wife clasped her hands in suspense, and asked: "Am I, then, not your lawful wife?" "You are my loved and lawful wife," was the prompt reply; "my first wife died four years before I came to Dubuque and met you." Then he related how he had married his first wife and been summoned to his home to find her dead in childbirth. Then he went west and settled in Dubuque, where the second romance of his life came about. Six years ago he received a letter from the woman who had nursed his first wife. She wrote that she was upon her death-bed, and could not rest until she had confessed her share in a base crime. The wife had died, but the son had survived, and through a large bribe proffered by the dead woman's father, the nurse's lips had been sealed, and the husband told that the child had died with its mother. This man, the father-in-law was wealthy, but his daughter's death had left him without an heir, and he took this means of supplying what fate had denied. With her last breath the nurse informed her employer that she had divulged the truth to the gentleman in Dubuque, and immediately upon her death the father-in-law went west and offered a large bribe. This was refused, but the secret was kept. The son was a millionaire in the city of P., and his father was anxious to see him. The second wife was thus told the truth for the first time, and asked to go east and pay the first wife's son a visit. When the story was told, the wife announced in low tones: "Since you have kept it from me so long I would rather you had never repeated it." The excitement caused by the recital proved fatal. In two days the lady was dead.

Frederick The Great's Knowledge of Affairs.

History has preserved many characteristic traits illustrative of the mode in which Frederick directed the whole machinery of State by a minute control of its most subordinate parts, and which likewise fully evidenced how entirely his heart was set upon the welfare of his people. A document was once laid before him for signature, confirmatory of a justice of the peace in his office. On reading the name the king paused, and desired the Minister to be summoned. To him he expressed considerable annoyance at the selection of such an individual, while the Minister endeavored to defend the appointment by recountering the high qualifications of the person selected. The king desired that a particular document be brought him from one of the law-offices, and, after perusing it, addressed the Minister: "Look ye; this man has carried on a lawsuit with his own mother about a few acres of land, and she has been obliged on her very death-bed to take an oath respecting such a paltry matter. How could I expect from such a man with such a heart that he should care for the welfare of my people? Away with this thing; let another be chosen!"

Among the numerous pests of the South African bush, one of the most formidable is the puff-adder, so called from its habit of inflating its head and neck just before striking its prey. Its mode of attack is to throw back its head and strike downward with the two hooked teeth that project from its upper jaw, inflicting a wound which is almost invaribly fatal. Its fondness for preying upon mice, which are its chief food, frequently leads it into the houses of the colonists, who find it a very troublesome guest, inasmuch as its body is so tough and elastic as to defy almost any weapon except a charge of shot. On one occasion, the wife of a missionary living in one of the remote settlements of Cape Colony, noticed on the floor of the room in which she was sitting the empty skin of a mouse, out of which the flesh had been sucked as clean as could have been the inside of an orange. Detecting at once the well known traces of the puff-adder, she cautiously searched the whole room, and at length, lifting a corner of the matting upon which her baby was lying asleep, found the snake coiled up underneath. With great presence of mind she refrained from disturbing it, and, stepping to the door, called in one of her Dutch servants, who speedily made an end of the intruder with his gun.

What Rev. A. H. Moment thinks of Bob Ingersoll.

He is a man merely of words, and his arguments, if what he says may be called such, are but the effusions of a buffoon, the soap-bubbles of a hare-brained mob-orater. In one of his lectures he demonstrates that "an honest God is the noblest work of man," and people cheer him as he asserts that faith in Christ is a mixture of insanity and ignorance, that to believe in God is to confess oneself either a fool or a knave. But when the crude sneers and cheap wit have fallen on the air that is the last of them, and what he calls his arguments have been refuted by two agencies. The first is a thoughtful people who, although they may be carried away with him in the lecture-room, think about what he has said after they leave it. That after thought is a curse to him. The other agency are the newspapers, which have done much to bring him before the public in order that his utterances might be recorded in cold type. Perhaps his graceful oratory, that drapery of language, and the interpolation of proper distances of resonant periods may charm a hearer, but the reader finds him to be nothing but a clattering piece of mechanism. Cold type is a terrible rebuke to him. Yet, as I have said, he has strength. Many a young man has sunken deeper into licentiousness because of the doctrines heard from his foul tongue; many men whose depraved tastes inclin them to cling to habits of debauchery and lust find their justification for doing so in what he says. To be sure they are men of two few brains to know the difference between truth and bantering; they are not men who read Huxley and Tyndall and such scholarly skeptics, for doubters with brains are not among Ingersoll's followers; they are the scum of society, who want only an authority, no matter how weak or shallow, to bear them along in sinning, and in Ingersoll they find such a guide. Yet these men have souls to save, and so far as Ingersoll is responsible for encouraging them in sin, so far will be held responsible on the judgment day.

Apologies.

The man who tells the truth can not apologize for it, unless he is willing to avoid personal consequences by humiliations which sap the last drop of manhood from his mental and physical organism. It may not be proper at all times to tell the truth—that is to say, there are times when "silence is golden" when reticence is prudent, and secrets may be withheld; but when the truth is spoken, no matter under what circumstances the utterance is made, every consideration of good citizenship, manhood, courage, good name, and the satisfaction of self-respect, demand that it shall be adhered to. Bullets may fly thick as hailstones, knives flash in starlight, sunlight or gaslight, blood spurt from tongueless wounds, and death come in haggard forms—never mind, stand by the truth, though the heavens fall. If facts are wanted, group them, mass the evidence, and patiently and heroically wait for the verdict. The world loves the truth. It despises hypocrisy, cant, subterfuges, cowardice. There are no monuments for men whose legs, prompted by weak hearts, have a back-action movement. A brave man in his shroud, with a bullet in his head, is more honored than a poltroon with plumes in his hat, and a smirk on his face. It has been said and sung for ages that "truth will out," and the world believes it, and applauds it when it comes to the surface; crush it, bludgeon it, but it can not be kept beneath the soil. There is divinity in truth, and heaven is pledged for its final triumph. Its apostles may be killed, and the assassins may for a while, go free, but only for a while. The fates pursue them through every lane and avenue of life, into the tomb and to the gates of perdition, until at last truth waves its banners above the battered citadels of error, and the world joins in the glad acclaim of victory. He who sets in motion truth forces may go down before his eyes view the blessings of its triumphs or his ears catch the far-away notes of victory, but his name will not be forgotten, and his grave will be a shrine where the brave, the good and the true will kneel and offer their devotions of affection. There is no good place in the world to apologize for telling the truth. It can not be "taken back." Once uttered, it stands; and though crushed to earth it rises again more stately than ever. Truth always holds up its head. Crowned with divinity, it never cringes. An attribute of omnipotence, it lifts its votaries to intimate communion with heaven. The world needs the truth; the best interests of society demand the truth, and he who would apologize for speaking it is wanting in the essential qualities of manhood.

Treasure Trove in Texas.

(Waco (Tex.) Telephone.)

Mr. Mcl. D. McKissick settled on the Brazos, near Rock Dam, some twenty-five years ago. Mr. McKissick farmer, and when the war broke out was possessed of many slaves, herds and fertile acres of land. A bachelor, he led a frugal life, and was known to possess considerable money. The reputation of McKissick's wealth proved his death for one night in 1865, just before the close of the war, he was murdered. Suspicion fell upon members of a battalion of roving cavalrymen, under command of one Colonel Beard, who were then quartered on the Brazos, doing no good for the Confederacy or the country. In fact, they were said to be in reality jayhawkers and thieves. How much money, if any the murderers rescued, was never known, but Mr. McKissick's slaves always insisted that the bulk of their master's wealth was not found. Mr. McKissick left a brother, William McKissick, and a sister, who are now residing near Mount Calm, in Limestone county. Near Rock Dam stands an old tumble-down hut that once belonged to McKissick, being on his land. It has not been used for years. Last Friday morning a colored man who cultivated a field near the Rock Dam concluded he would go to the river to fish. He entered the dilapidated, floorless shanty and began to dig in one corner for earth-worms to use for bait. He presently unearthed an iron pot, covered with a lid. The darky was surprised. Taking the lid off his surprise was turned to amazement, for there in the pot lay a heap of gold coin, American gold, in $10 and $20 pieces. The whole sum was $8,065, all in gold. The negro secured the gold, and next day went to Martin, where he got to drinking. His lavish expenditure of money caused suspicion. Whisky loosened his tongue, and the whole story leaked out.

Two young men went into the woods at Aurora, Ill., to play a game of cards. As they were rival lovers, and had not previously spoken to each other for months, it is conjectured that the girl in dispute was the stake that they played for. The winner, however, was not permitted to gain the prize, for his opponent instantly shot him through the heart. An effort to settle rivalry by chance had a not less sad result in Texas. The two suitors were convinced that the young woman would accept either if the other would let her alone, and they agreed to throw dice to decide which should give her up. The loser honestly endeavored to keep the compact, but the woman refused to be disposed of in that way, and wrote to him that she would marry nobody else, and would not even see the winner. The latter would not believe that his competitor had tried to retire from the contest, and so murdered him.

He Died Game.

CHEYENNE, WYOMING, May 12.

Dug Reed was taken out of jail here last night and hanged by a mob. The lynchers generously permitted Dug. to make his own selection as to the manner of his death, and with a coolness characteristic of the man he did so. Taking a rope in his hands in the presence of the mob, he rapidly heeled it up a convenient telegraph pole, fastened one end around the top of the pole, and formed a noose at the other end. He then placed the noose around his neck, shouted "good bye, boys!" and then jumped off, amid the shouts of the admiring crowd. He died almost instantly.

—Moles are a nuisance in gardens. There are various means of destroying them or driving them away. Correspondents of Vick's Magazine say soak corn until soft, then with a penknife open each kernel, and place in a dose of strychnia and close up again. Open a hole through the dirt over their roads drop in the corn and cover again. Another says plant in the garden the seeds of the mole tree (Euphorbia Lathysis) a hardy annual, sometimes called caper spurge.

Sheep, owing to their shyness, should be treated with great kindness. Their treatment should be such that they will actually learn to entertain an affection for their keeper. A flock of wild sheep is about the most unprofitable investment that a farmer can make. They are continually getting themselves into trouble and causing great annoyance, if not loss, to their owner. Never haul them about by the wool, but place the arms about the body and round the foreleg. In catching them, take them by the hind leg, just above the hock.

THE EAST.

The house of Dr. Delos W. Southworth, at Angola, N. Y., was burned last week. The doctor perished in the flames, and his wife was probably fatally burned....A somewhat famous case of conflict between two high tribunals, the one ecclesiastical the other judicial, has just been decided in Philadelphia. It was the case of George H. Stuart, a wealthy and prominent member of the Reformed Presbyterian church, who was suspended by the General Synod for the grave offenses of singing hymns and partaking of communion with members of other evangelical churches. The case was appealed to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, which has now upset the Synod's action and restored Mr. Stuart to membership.

The Meriden Woolen Company, of Meriden, Ct., has failed and closed its factory. Liabilities, $250,000.

A dispatch from Pocasset, Mass., says "the Freemans—husband and wife—have been found guilty of homicide, and fully committed for trial. Freeman says he will have an astonishing revelation to make, and still maintains that he was justified of God. His wife is greatly crushed by the growing conviction that she has been guilty of a crime."

Nine stores, a bank, and four dwelling-houses in the center of the village of Unadilla, N. Y., were burned last week. Loss, $60,000; partially insured....Fuller, Warren & Co.'s Clinton stove works, Troy, N. Y., have been partially burned. Loss estimated at $60,000 to $75,000; covered by insurance.

THE WEST.

A small boat, containing a party of six men, who had been out on a fishing excursion, was capsized in the Mississippi river, near St. Louis, and three of the party drowned.

Burned: The lumber-yard of Palmer & Fuller, and several frame buildings, on Union and Ruble streets, Chicago, loss about $200,000; three wholesale stores on Fifth street, St. Louis, loss upward of $300,000; a portion of the office of the Detroit Post and Tribune, loss about $20,000.

The ninety lumber-yards of Chicago contain 194,180,957 feet of lumber and timber; 111,250,000 shingles; 18,455,522 pieces of lath; 390,905 feet of pickets, and 118,123 cedar posts.

The Detroit Post and Tribune publishes detailed crop reports from the wheat-producing portions of Michigan. With few exceptions, every point reports a promise of a yield equal to that of last year.—The Omaha Republican reports copious rains throughout Nebraska, and the crop prospects decidedly encouraging.

Mark Gray, who attempted to shoot Edwin Booth at McVicker's Theater in Chicago, some time ago, and was found to be insane, has been sent to the Insane Asylum at Elgin, Ill.

The Board of Review of the National Trotting Association (Col. C. W. Woolley, of Cincinnati, presiding), at its sessions in Chicago last week, expelled two of the most noted turfmen of the country—R. C. Pate, of St. Louis, owner of Woodford Mambrino, Lucille, and other celebrated horses, and J. N. Haddock, late owner of the flyer Edwin Forrest. The offense for which they were bounced was the putting up a job and selling out a race at Utica, N. Y., in which Edwin Forrest and Mambrino were the contestants, in August last. Edward Pyle, driver of Edward, the winner of the race, was also expelled. Gus Glidden and Morrill Higbie, who drove Forrest; and Biggs, driver of Dick Wright, were suspended until next December, and the case continued until the same time for further investigation. The decision of the judges in the Bonesetter-Proteine 2:20 race at Chicago, last fall, was reversed, and the race awarded by the board to Bonesetter. As a result of this latter decision, Proteine and Bonesetter have been matched for a $10,000 race by their owners. The race is to be trotted at Chicago on the 19th of next July.

Copious rains have fallen all over the Northwest, thus breaking up the protracted drought, the effects of which were beginning to be seriously felt. From every State, and almost every locality, come the most encouraging reports of the growing grain crops....The National Convention of Millers, at their meeting in Chicago, passed a resolution favoring the establishment of a special grade for "scoured" wheat, so as to prevent it from being graded above its merits, on account of its fair, but false appearance....Judge Dillon, of the United States Circuit Court for the Eighth Judicial Circuit, which includes the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and Minnesota, has accepted an offer to preside over the New York Columbia College Law School, and will resign his seat on the bench.

The Indianapolis postoffice was robbed, the other day, in a bold and dexterous manner. The safe in the registry department was rifled of a package of ten money-order letters, fifty-five registered letters, and about $4,000 in cash. The clerk had turned his back for a few minutes to look over the morning paper, taking advantage of which the bold thief stealthily crept to the safe, seized upon the contents, and made good his escape....The most extraordinary game of billiards ever played was that contested in Chicago, the other day, by Jacob Schaefer and George Slosson. Schaefer ran the game of 1,000 points out in three innings, making runs of 5, 690 and 305, thus accomplishing the tremendous average of 333⅓. The game was the three-ball French carom, and was for a stake of $1,000 and the championship of the United States.

The House Committee on Levees of the Mississippi river have agreed to report favorably the bill introduced by Mr. Gibson to provide for the appointment of a Mississippi River Commission to direct and complete the surveys of the Mississippi river, and report the result to the Secretary of War, together with such plans and estimates as will improve the navigation of the river and prevent destructive floods.

It is stated from Washington that "the decision of Judge Dundy, at Omaha, in the Standing Bear habeas-corpus case, in which he virtually declares Indians citizens, with the right to go where they please, regardless of treaty stipulations, is regarded by the Government as a heavy blow to the present Indian system, and that, if sustained, it will prove extremely dangerous alike to whites and Indians. If the power of the Government to hold Indians upon their reservation, or to return them when they escape, is denied, the Indians become a body of tramps, moving without restraint wherever they please, and exposed to the attacks of frontiersmen without redress from the Government. The District Attorney at Omaha has been instructed to take the necessary steps to carry the question to a higher court."

The Secretary of War, in accordance with the ruling of the United States Court a Omaha, has ordered Standing Bear and other imprisoned Ponca Indians to be released.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

(EXTRA SESSION.)

In the Senate, on the 9th inst., the House bill providing for the payment of the money heretofore appropriated to James B. Eads and his associates for the construction of jetties and other works at the South pass of the Mississippi river was passed. Consideration of the bill prohibiting military interference at elections was then resumed, and Mr. Edmunds delivered an elaborate argument in opposition thereto. Messrs. Blaine and Chandler also spoke against the bill, after which it was passed just as it came from the House—yeas, 33; nays, 21.——In the House, the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove the political disabilities of J. C. Pemberton, of Philadelphia, gave rise to an amusing colloquy between Messrs. Conger and Cox, which Mr. Knott cut short by moving the previous question, and the bill was passed. The House resumed the consideration of the Warner Silver bill, and was addressed by Mr. Weaver in advocacy of the bill, and in favor of the double standard.

In the Senate, on the 10th inst., consideration was resumed of the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and Mr. Hill, of Georgia, delivered a long speech in favor of that part of the bill in regard to jurors and Supervisors of Elections. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Hill quoted from a letter written by Zachariah Chandler in 1861 to the Governor of Michigan, in which he (Chandler) said there must be a little blood-letting; that without it the Union would not be worth a rush. Mr. Hill asked if Chandler had lost any blood in the war. The latter wanted to know how much blood Mr. Hill shed in the late war. Mr. Hill—The difference between us was I was not in favor of shedding anybody's blood. Mr. Chandler—Nor I, except to punish treason and traitors. The Senator from Georgia is not the man to talk about other men saving their own blood. He took good care to put his blood in Fort Lafayette, where it was out of the way of both rebel and Union bullets.——In the House, Mr. Kelley occupied nearly the whole day in an elaborate speech on the Warner Silver bill.

The Senate resumed consideration of the Legislative Appropriation bill on the 12th, and Mr. Windom spoke in opposition to the policy of the Democrats, denouncing it as revolutionary and unconstitutional. Mr. Coke, of Texas, defended the position of the Democrats.——The President's message vetoing the Military Interference bill was read in the House and entered in the journal. Mr. Deering moved to suspend the rules and pass the Army Appropriation bill, with the political sections left out. Rejected—yeas, 101; nays, 109. All the Greenbackers except Messrs. Ladd and Barlow voted yea. Bills were introduced in the House by Mr. Newberry, for the construction of a tunnel under the Detroit river at or near Grosse Isle, and a bridge over the Detroit river at or near Detroit city; by Mr. Dunnell, appropriating $1,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi river between the mouth of the Illinois river and the Falls of St. Anthony; by Mr. Buckner, reducing the President's salary to $25,000; by Mr. Cox, abolishing the jurors' test oath; by Mr. Stephens, authorizing the coinage of the silver dollar and fractions thereof of the full standard value following the metric system. The Income Tax bill was defeated in the House—yeas 104, nays 94—not the necessary two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

The Senate did nothing but discuss the Legislative Appropriation bill on the 13th.——In the House, a motion was made to pass the Military Interference bill over the President's veto, the vote on which resulted, yeas, 127; nays, 97; so, there not being two-thirds majority, the bill was rejected. The Warner Silver bill was discussed. There was a personal altercation between two North Carolina members—Russell, Republican, and Kitchin, Democrat—in which some hard words were used.

The Senate resumed consideration of the Legislative Appropriation bill on the 14th, and the reading of the political sections was completed. Mr. Kernan then took the floor, and made an extended speech in favor of repealing the jurors' test-oath. Mr. Beck offered an amendment to the bill requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to use the funds for the redemption of fractional currency in payment of the arrears of pensions, which was adopted after an animated debate. Mr. Vest gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill proposing to organize the Indian Territory into a State, and providing for its admission into the Union.——The House continued the discussion of the Warner Silver bill.

Mr. Thurman delivered a speech on the Legislative Appropriation bill on the 15th inst. He assailed the speeches of Senators Conkling and Windom, declaring them to be merely rhetorical efforts to deceive and mislead the ignorant, to stir up the passions of the people, and array one section of the country against the other. He upheld the action of the Democrats in placing political riders upon the Appropriation bills, and asserted that a third of the laws upon the statute books were part of Appropriation bills. He entered into a long argument in favor of the repeal of the jurors' test oath and the Supervisors' law. Mr. Cockrell introduced a resolution in the Senate authorizing the negotiation of a proper treaty of reciprocity and commerce with France. Mr. Farley introduced a bill for the relief of John A. Sutter, the first discoverer of gold in California, on account of lands taken from and services rendered by him to the United States.——In the House, the Warner Silver bill was under consideration all day, and voting on the measure by sections was begun. An amendment to increase the weight of the silver dollar to 460 grains received only 52 votes, 176 being recorded against it. Another, proposing to limit free coinage to silver produced from American mines, was rejected—105 to 130; and one requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase all silver offered and coin it on Government account was also defeated, but by a very close vote—114 to 115.

Instinct or Reason?

A small English terrier belonging to a friend has been taught to ring for the servant. To test if the dog knew why it rang the bell, he was told to do so while the girl was in the room. The little fellow looked up in the most intelligent manner at the person giving the order—his master or mistress, I forget which—then at the servant, and refused to obey, although the order was repeated more than once. The servant left the room, and a few minutes afterward the dog rang the bell immediately on being told to do so. I give the following as told me by my wife, now dead, who personally witnessed the transaction on various occasions. At her sister's house in Kent a donkey which, when not employed by the children, grazed in a field with some cows, was in the regular habit of acting as follows: At the usual hour for the cows to come home to be milked, the donkey lifted the latch of the field-gate, opened and held back the gate—which would otherwise have swung close again—till all the cows passed out, then allowed the gate to shut and went home with the cows. Of course, no one taught the donkey to do this, but the quadruped gave the biped a practical lesson, from which I am not aware that they drew the abstract verbally formulated conclusion that the reason may be exercised without rhetoric.—Nature.

THE VETO.

Message of President Hayes Vetoing the Military Interference Bill.

To the House of Representatives: After a careful consideration of the bill entitled "An act to prohibit military interference at elections," I return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections to its approval:

In a communication sent to the House of Representatives on the 29th of last month, returning to the House without my approval the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," I endeavored to show by quotations from the statutes of the United States now in force, and by a brief statement of facts in regard to the recent elections in several States, that no additional legislation was necessary to prevent interference with elections by the military or naval forces of the United States.

The fact was presented in that communication that at the time of the passage of the act of June 18, 1878, in relation to the employment of the army as posse comitatus, or otherwise, it was maintained by its friends that it would establish a vital and fundamental principle which would secure to the people protection against a standing army.

The fact was also referred to, that since the passage of this act Congressional, State and municipal elections had been held throughout the Union, and that in no instance has complaint been made of the presence of United States soldiers at the polls.

Holding, as I do, the opinion that any military interference whatever at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections, and sincerely desiring to concur with Congress in all of its measures, it is with very great regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the bill before me is not only unnecessary to prevent such interference, but is a dangerous departure from long-settled and important constitutional principles.

The true rule as to the employment of military forces at elections is not doubtful. No intimidation or coercion should be allowed to control or influence citizens in the exercise of their right to vote, whether it appears in the shape of combinations of evil-disposed persons, or of armed bodies of militia of a State, or of the military force of the United States.

The elections should be free from all forcible interference, and as far as practicable from all apprehension of such interference. No soldiers, either of the Union or of the State militia, should be present at the polls to take the place or to perform the duties of an ordinary civil police force.

There has been and will be no violation of this rule under the orders from me during this administration. But there should be no denial of the right of the National Government to employ its military force on any day at any place, in case such employment is necessary to enforce the constitution and laws of the United States.

The bill before me is as follows: "Be it enacted, etc., that it shall not be lawful to bring to or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State, any part of the army or navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, or to enforce section 4 of article 4 of the constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, on the application of the Legislature or the Executive of the State where such force is to be used; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed."

It will be observed that the bill exempts from the general prohibition against the employment of a military force at the polls two specified cases. These exceptions recognize and concede the soundness of the principle that military forces may properly and constitutionally be used at places of election when such use is necessary to enforce the constitution and laws. But the excepted cases leave a prohibition so extensive and far-reaching that its adoption will seriously impair the efficiency of the Executive Department of the Government.

The first act expressly authorizing the use of military power to execute the laws was passed almost as early as the organization of the Government under the constitution, and was approved by President Washington, May 2, 1792. It is as follows:

"Section 2. And be it further enacted, that whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals by this act, the same being certified to the President of the United States by an Associate Justice or District Judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call for the militia of such State to suppress such combinations and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and if the militia of a State where such combinations may happen shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States be not in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States most convenient thereto as may be necessary; and the use of the militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session."

In 1795 this provision was substantially reenacted in a law which repealed the act of 1792. In 1807 the following act became the law, by the approval of President Jefferson:

"That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ for the same purposes such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect."

By this act it will be seen that the scope of the law of 1795 was extended so as to authorize the National Government to use, not only the militia, but the army and navy of the United States, in causing the laws to be duly executed.

The important provision of the acts of 1792, 1795 and 1807, modified in its terms from time to time, to adapt it to the existing emergency, remained in force until by an act approved by President Lincoln, July 29, 1861, it was reenacted substantially in the same language in which it is now found in the Revised Statutes, viz:

"Section 5,298. Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed."

This ancient and fundamental law has been in force from the foundation of the Government. It is now proposed to abrogate it on certain days, and at certain places. In my judgment, no fact has been produced which tends to show that it ought to be repealed or suspended for a single hour, at any place in any of the States or Territories of the Union. All the teachings of experience in the course of our history are in favor of sustaining its efficiency unimpaired on every occasion when the supremacy of the constitution has been resisted, and the perpetuity of our institutions imperiled. The principle of this statute enacted by the fathers has enabled the Government of the Union to maintain its authority and to preserve the integrity of the nation at the most critical periods of our history. My predecessors in the Executive office have relied on this great principle. It was on this principle that President Washington suppressed the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania, in 1794. In 1806, on the same principle, President Jefferson broke up the Burr conspiracy, by issuing orders for the employment of such force, either of the regulars or of the militia, and by such proceedings of the civil authorities as might enable them to suppress effectually the further progress of the enterprise. It was under the same authority that President Jackson crushed nullification in South Carolina, and that President Lincoln issued his call for troops to save the Union, in 1861. On numerous other occasions of less significance, under probably every administration, and certainly under the present, this power has been usefully exerted to enforce the laws without objection by any party in the country, and almost without attracting public attention.

The great elementary constitutional principle, which was the foundation of the original statute of 1792, and which has been its essence in the various forms it has assumed since its first adoption, is that the Government of the United States possesses, under the constitution, in full measure, the power of self-protection by its own agencies, altogether independent of the State authority, and, if need be, against the hostility of the State Governments. It should remain embodied in our statutes, unimpaired, as it has been from the origin of the Government. It should be regarded as hardly less valuable or less sacred than a provision of the constitution itself.

There are many other important statutes containing provisions that are liable to be suspended or annulled at the times and places of holding elections if the bill before me should become law.

I do not undertake to furnish a list of them. Many of them, perhaps most of them, have been set forth in debates on this measure. They relate to extradition, to crimes against the Election laws, to quarantine regulations, to neutrality, to Indian reservations, to civil rights of citizens, and to other subjects. In regard to them all it may be safely said that the meaning and effect of this bill is to take from the General Government an important part of its power to enforce the laws.

Another grave objection to the bill is its discrimination in favor of the State and against the national authorities. The presence or employment of the army or navy of the United States is lawful under the terms of this bill at the place where an election was being held in a State to uphold the authority of a State Government, then and there in the need of such military intervention, but unlawful to uphold the authority of the Government of the United States, then and there in the need of such military intervention. Under this bill the presence and employment of the army or navy of the United States would be lawful, and might be necessary to maintain the conduct of a State election against the domestic violence that would overthrow it, but would be unlawful to maintain the conduct of a national election against military power resorted to for the execution of the constitutional powers in support of the State or national authority. Both functions of the Government were put upon the same footing. By the act of 1807 the employment of the army and navy was authorized for the performance of both constitutional duties in the same terms. In all the later statutes on the same subject matter, the same measure of authority to the Government has been accorded for the performance of both these duties. No precedent has been found in any previous legislation, and no sufficient reason has been given for the discrimination in favor of the State and against the national authority which this bill contains. Under the sweeping terms of the bill, the National Government is effectually shut out from exercise of right and from an imperative duty, to use its whole executive power whenever and wherever required for the enforcement of its laws.

In places and times when and where its elections are held, the employment of its organized armed force for any such purpose would be an offense against the law unless called for by and therefore upon permission of the authorities of the State in which the occasion arises. What is this but the substitution of the discretion of the State Governments for the discretion of the Government of the United States as to the performance of its own duties?

In my judgment, this is an abandonment of its obligations by the National Government—a subordination of national authority and an intrusion of State supervision over national duties which amounts, in spirit and tendency, to State supremacy. Although I believe that the existing statutes are abundantly adequate to completely prevent military interference with the elections, in the sense in which the phrase is used in the title of this bill, and is employed by the people of this country, I shall find no difficulty in concurring in any additional legislation limited to that object which does not interfere with the indispensable exercise of the powers of the Government and the constitution and laws.

Executive Mansion, May 12, 1879.

The White House.

The White House is the greatest residence in America. It has cost more money than the Stewart mansion on Fifth avenue, New York; or, with its rebuilding, refurnishing, etc., about $1,700,000. The original cost, in 1792, was about $333,000; it was begun in that year, occupied in 1800, rebuilt in 1815, reoccupied in 1818, and its porticos completed as late as 1829. The East room was finished only fifty years ago. Every one of our Presidents, except Washington, has lived in this great house, and he has poked his horse's head into its portal to look up at the workmen plastering on the scaffold.

An Irish architect, named Heber, direct from Dublin via Charleston, took the award of $500 for the design, and he built and rebuilt it, and lies buried in the Catholic cemetery here, and his descendants are respectable lawyers and citizens of the place.

A building for a private residence of 170 feet front by 68 feet deep, with one room in it 80x40 feet, may yet attract republican attention; its vestibule within the front door is alone 50x40 feet. Twenty acres of garden and park immediately inclose it, and, on either side, each separated by only 450 feet, are buildings which cost $7,000,000 to $12,000,000 apiece; yet, in all its apparent antiquity, how new! The lawn is still a naked plain, reaching off to the Potomac, like a desert coming to the palace stairs. Like Versailles, in the time of Louis XIV., Washington is a Government creation, and this White House is hoary only by events. The President's office, which is in the second story, is also the Cabinet room, and is not a very large apartment for the White House, although about 35 or 40 feet in depth by, perhaps, 30 feet wide, and with a high ceiling. A long table is in the middle of the floor, with leather-seated chairs around it; the two windows have long lambrequin curtains of a dark bluish-gray color. A large map of the United States is on the wall. The carpet is of a red tint, with large figures. The general effect of the room as one enters is that of a library without books.—Washington Correspondence.

Practical joking is not always unattended with danger to the perpetrator, as is evident from an event which occurred on Thursday evening at Suze, Sarthe, France. A man named Verle wrapped himself in a white sheet to frighten some girls, and so far succeeded that they all ran away screaming, except one, who aimed a revolver at the pretended ghost, and fired six shots. Verle fell dead, one of the bullets having passed through his heart.

The trail of the serpent is over all humanity. Man comes naked into the world, is snaked through life, and goes naked out of it.

TRADE NOTES.

Of 23,612 clergymen belonging to the Church of England, 8,615 were graduated at the University of Cambridge, 7,682 at Oxford, 1,761 at Dublin, 655 at Durham, 176 at the University of London, and 1,646 are enrolled as non-graduates.

The American Export Journal says "the estimated value of the manufactured products of the New England States, according to the last census, was $900,116,772. The capital invested was estimated at $500,050,041; wages, $213,763,206; materials, $600,956,000; and products at $909,116,772."

The iron interest seems to be arising from its long sleep and awaking to new life and energy. No class had felt the depression more than those who have had their capital locked up in iron and steel. Returning prosperity to those means heart and vigor to widely connected interests and diversified industries.

The total value of our exports for the year ending with March was $720,000,000, against $665,000,000 for the twelve months ending March 31, 1878, a gain of $55,000,000. The excess of exports over imports for the last twelve months reached the enormous total of $283,000,000, against $199,000,000 for the year ending with March, 1878, showing a net increase of our foreign commerce of $84,000,000.

Forty-nine failures were reported in New York city in April, in which the total liabilities amounted to $1,199,883, and the assets were estimated at $633,121. Compared with the preceding month, this shows a large increase in liabilities; March having forty failures, with liabilities of $480,449, and assets $211,754. In April, 1878, there were seventy-three failures, with total liabilities of $9,890,000.

The general revival of manufacturing industry cheers Troy, N. Y., where 5,000 men and boys, or a tenth of the city's population, are now employed in the different factories. The Burden horse-shoe works and the Albany and Rensselaer iron and steel works, together employing 3,300 hands, are in full operation for the first time since 1873. All but three of the stove firms are also running their foundries, and, while profits are small all around, almost all the manufacturers are crowded with orders, and could use more room if they had it.

The wheat trade of Philadelphia is growing enormously; the receipts there last month were 1,480,600 bushels, against 353,400 bushels in April last year—increase, 1,127,200 bushels. The receipts of corn during the same month were 2,715,200 bushels against 3,070,000 bushels in the same period in 1878—decrease 355,800 bushels. The receipts of rye increased from 54,700 bushels to 153,500 bushels, and the most of it was taken for exportation. During the month 137,534 barrels of crude petroleum were received in Philadelphia, against 33,590 barrels in the same month last year.

Zulu Beauties.

Two tawny women from Zululand are on exhibition in the London Aquarium. They were kidnapped into that country from the interior, and afterward an attempt to educate them was made in the Cape of Good Hope, whither they had been sent by an English traveler, and where they learned a little Dutch, still less English, and singing. "Their songs are of war and of peace—the latter displaying some amusing graces, the evidence of Cape culture; but their heart is more in their work when they sing of war. In picturesque array, they sing to the music of a piano and small drum—representing the inevitable tom-tom—and, having dragged forth their victim (an English lady) and bound her to a tree, they execute a wild pas de triomphe, finishing by throwing her to the ground and threatening her with a dagger and an ax. The curtain here falls, but rises again and shows the quondam victim erect, with helmet and trident, and her dark assailants on their knees singing 'Rule Britannia' with discordant energy."

A man with a creaky pair of boots has music in his sole.

THE BAYONET PARTY.

The Record of the Radical Revolutionists on the Use of the Army.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal.]

When the Republicans first began to unfold their opposition to the repeal of the section of the Revised Statutes authorizing the use of the army at the polls to manipulate elections in the interest of the dominant party, they based their objection on the method of repealing the obnoxious law, which was that of attaching the repealing clause to the Army Appropriation bill. They were speedily dismounted from this position upon the fact being proven that during the thirteen years in which they controlled legislation in the House they legislated and repealed previous legislation by the rider method not less than 388 times. Finding themselves adrift, they then boldly took the ground that the bayonet law was a righteous enactment in itself, and that the Federal army was absolutely necessary to "keep the peace at the polls;" that the State authorities had nothing to do with this process, and that the Federal Government, being supreme over all the States, and, in fact, absolute in its authority, the bayonet, being the symbol of its power, must always be an auxiliary to elections.

During the debate the Republican Senators and Representatives, ignoring history, frequently stated that nobody had ever been interfered with at elections; that no soldier had ever been seen at the polls, and that the Democrats were "making a fuss about nothing." Of course Senator Beck and other Democrats very speedily showed the mendacity of the Republican asseverations, as the history of this country is very well written in the public records and in the minds of the people.

The States of Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania are among the Northern States which have been so invaded by Federal troops after the war was over, and when there was no reason why the troops should appear, except the very palpable one that it was a "party necessity" of the Republican administration. It is "party necessity" which makes the Republican leaders so earnestly desirous of retaining that bayonet law on the statute book to-day, and only "party necessity." What that party has done it will do again to obstruct the liberties of the people, and as long as that law stands to be executed under the transparent pretense of "keeping peace at the polls," so long will it be utilized for party purposes if the Republicans retain control of the Government.

Few people have forgotten the use of Federal troops at New York in 1870. Secretary of War Belknap, after discussing the matter with Grant and the Republican leaders, issued orders for troops to invade New York city "in view of the apprehension that there may be opposition to the United States laws in connection with the coming election in the city of New York, Nov. 8, 1870." That is, without any call for troops from the Governor of the State, the troops must go to New York because there may possibly be some opposition to the United States laws. The real purpose, under this language, can easily be read. The troops—all the available men at Willet's point, New York harbor, all the available men and artillery at Forts Hamilton, Wadsworth and Wood—were ordered to "hold themselves in readiness for service at literally a moment's notice," at their stations near the polls where American citizens were to exercise the right of suffrage, while several ships of war were anchored near the city. This great military demonstration in a time of profound peace was protested against by Gov. Hoffman, but was fully in accord with the principles of the Republican bulldozers. Mr. Blaine, who has laughed at the idea of any Federal taoops ever being so employed, is strangely oblivious of the facts of history. The New York Tribune itself, which has taken the ground that the bayonet law is a sacred one, described the military bulldozing at the polls in November, 1870, thus:

> The troops came on Monday night and disembarked silently to their quarters. During the day perfect order reigned. The headquarters of the departments, at the corner of Houston and Greene streets, presented a quiet appearance. The stairways, however, leading to the two upper stories of the building were packed with troops. The Engineer Department from Willet's point, numbering 200 men, with companies H and L of the Fifth United States Artillery, from Fort Trumbull, New London, Ct., all under command of Col. Kiddoo, were quartered in the halls and on the stairs. Their arms were stacked and the men were scattered around on benches and on the floor, or stood in groups engaged in conversation. All were armed with the latest improved needle-gun and furnished with forty rounds of ammunition, with 100 rounds a man in reserve.
> At pier No. 28, North river, Companies A, B and L of the United States Artillery, from Fort Adams, Newport, were quartered on the steamer Miles. In addition to these was Dupont's light battery of four guns. None were allowed to leave the boat or to enter without a pass. The men were in the lower part of the boat and the officers were in the cabin under Col. Hunt.
> Companies B, C, D, H and M of the First United States Artillery, Col. Vogdes, from Forts Hamilton and Wadsworth, New York harbor, were stationed in the three upper stories of No. 294 Broadway.
> At No. 161 Avenue B, near Tompkins square, there were stationed the first five companies of the Eighth Infantry, Col. Bomford in command. This regiment came from David's island, and was armed with the needle-gun. They were quartered in the hall over a lager-beer saloon, and Company A was kept under arms ready for marching orders. The remaining five companies of the regiment were on Forty-fifth street, between First and Second avenue, in the large room of a brewery. Guards were, as in all cases, stationed at the top and bottom of the stairs, and all who applied for entrance were taken under guard before Col. Edie. Long rows of stacked arms extended the whole length of the hall. An ample supply of ammunition was brought to the place, amounting in the aggregate to 140 rounds for each man. In the river and harbor the frigates Guerriere and Naragansett were at anchor at the foot of Chambers street, North river, and Wall street, East river, respectively. The port-holes were all closed, however, and every appearance of warlike preparation on board was avoided. None other than the troops regularly stationed there were on Governor's island.

All this was done, be it remembered, without the request of Gov. Hoffman for troops, as required by the constitution. As long as that bayonet law stands on the books Republican administrations, under the pretense of "keeping the peace," will execute it, as in 1870, whenever "party necessity" suggests it. It is an infamy in the shape of legislation which makes our boasted liberty a mockery. It is a sword which will be brought out in the future, as it has been in the past, to intimidate voters from the polls, or, perhaps, to close the polls altogether if it remains a law. As long as it so remains scenes like that in New York in 1870 are possible.

The Meddlesome School of Politics.

I belong to that school in government which believes it is best to mind your own business and let other people do the same as to theirs. I belong to that school of politics which trusts the people of the United States under their various political organizations. I belong to that school of politics which believes that the people of a State have certain duties that you cannot limit here, and that they are competent to perform them, and I believe in their virtue and their intelligence to discharge them. The Senator from Maine belongs to that meddlesome school which is never happy except in some missionary colporteur enterprise, going abroad to correct people's morals and politics a long ways from home. The Senator from Maine is disturbed about the people of South Carolina, much disturbed about the people of Louisiana. I am not. There is the difference between us. I believe that the people who have sent the two Senators from South Carolina to this body are as competent, in their intelligence, their virtue, and their patriotism, to regulate their own affairs according to the highest standard of civilized morality, as the people of Maine or the people of Indiana. I have faith in the American people. All the people of this country are my countrymen. The trouble with the Senator from Maine and those who train with him on the other side of the Chamber is that they have a deep distrust, that they have had a long hatred, they have had a long acrimonious spell of political hatred toward the people of the South. It is not possible for them to trust that people; and however well-behaved and disposed the people of the South may be, however upright in their motives, however determined to disarm hostile criticism, they may sit up nights, spend sleepless nights as well as vigilant days to show the propriety of their conduct, it will not disarm criticism on that side of the Chamber, it will not disarm distrust, because the political party represented by the Senator from Maine feeds, thrives, prospers, grows fat, and spreads its branches broad and wide on every trouble and every speck of lawlessness that occurs under the Southern sky. You deceive nobody. I have for years in the other end of this Capitol seen the Republican party build itself up upon disturbances alleged, sometimes real, but most often unreal, throughout the South; and it would be contrary to human nature if the leaders of the Republican party had not sent, as they often have, their emissaries, those carpet-baggers, to stir up strife between the two races down there because of the political capital that it would bring to the Republican party in the North.

Consequently the Senator from Maine distrusts the people of South Carolina, and wants thirty-eight States to rush down and take charge of their affairs. He distrusts the people represented so well upon this floor by the Senator from Louisiana in my rear (Mr. Jonas), and he wants to spread his broad mantle of care, parental guardianship and protection over them.

Mr. President, that was not the Government our fathers made. I say here on this floor that that was not the Government that the fathers made when they framed this constitution. They made a Government and allotted its powers to different localities, trusted the people to carry out and discharge their duties under these powers in good faith, and the trouble with that side of the Chamber is that that lesson of our Government has escaped them, and they have had their hands on the necks of the Southern people and they are reluctant ever to withdraw them.

I think I have answered the Senator from Maine whether he and I and the rest of the States shall gather around and proclaim a protectorate over the people of any other State. When the people of a State, if such a thing should happen, become outlawed from civilized government, that raises a different question. But while their State is represented on this floor, while all the machinery of the State Government is in operation smoothly and harmoniously, no greater outrage, according to my notions of government, can be proposed than for us to invade their local affairs and tear from them the control of their own matters.—Hon. D. W. Voorhees in the U. S. Senate.

Prince Gortschakoff.

Gortschakoff is the model Minister of an enlightened despot. He is noble; he is cultured; a patriot, but no Chauvinist. He has some right to be an aristocrat, for the Gortschakoffs claim to descend from Ruric, the founder of the Russian monarchy, who flourished a thousand years ago. The family has given Russia two saints, and a good many Princes who merited whatever may be the exact opposite of canonization. He himself looks every inch a high-born and high-bred gentleman. Courteous and affable himself, he has been at no little pains to polish and humanize that most boorish of created beings, the Russian local officer.—London Truth.

A mad dog in Chesterfield county, South Carolina, recently bit Mr. Tucker, who in turn bit two of his children, and the lives of all three are now despaired of.

RUSSIA'S NEMESIS.

Activity of the Nihilists—Murderous Attacks Upon Officials—How a Governor Was Bagged by the Revolutionists.

As an illustration of the audacity of the revolutionists in St. Petersburg, it is reported that one night recently seditions placards were posted at the entrances of theaters and on the corners of the principal streets. As fast as the police tore these down they were replaced, and at length soldiers were called out to assist in removing the offensive papers and capturing the bill-stickers. But the placards continued to appear, and, though 150 persons were seized, nothing could be found to identify any of them with the disturbance.

—A short time ago, according to the correspondent of the London Telegraph, the St. Petersburg police discovered in the immediate vicinity of the Kasan Cathedral the body of a man lying in a pool of blood; by his side was found a blood-stained dagger. The throat of the unfortunate man was cut nearly through. On the corpse was a label, and upon this, inscribed in letters evidently written in red ink, were the following few words: "Ivan Sabego, 23 years of age, of the Medico-Chirurgical Academy, is hereby sentenced to the punishment of death, as a traitor. —The Socialist Revolutionary Executive Committee."

—The European papers are full of reports of murderous attacks upon Russian officers. Within five days there were five of these attacks in Kiev. At Moscow a spy has been murdered. At Polyunischeknice three policemen, charged with the arrest of some villagers, have been attacked on the public highway by a body of gentlemen carrying pistols and swords. The Governor of Kharkov is reported to have been kidnapped, and to be detained as a hostage by the conspirators. M. Piotrovski, chief of the Archangel police, has been stabbed in his house. Attached to the corpse there was the usual notice referring the deed to the action of the revolutionary committee. The leading police officer at Yalta, in the Crimea, has been arrested as a revolutionist. The student Bairatschewski, recently murdered at Moscow, whose death by a woman's hand was attributed to a love affair, has been discovered to have fallen a victim to the conspirators. The lady who shot him was a female executioner in the employ of the committee. At the theater of Rovno, near Poltava, an attempt was made to perform a piece in the South Russian dialect, an idiom spoken by 20,000,000 of people, but, in the interest of national uniformity and centralization, strictly excluded from the press, church, school and theater by the Government. The policemen, prohibiting the performance, were set upon by the audience. A fight ensued which, the military being reinforced, resulted in the defeat of the rioters. A Moscow student deputation, asking the local Governor to treat their arrested brethren with leniency, has been incarcerated. A stupendous number of arrests has been the consequence of these deplorable incidents.

—The Nihilists employ governesses to compromise the daughters of the highest officials in the imperial service. A Russian General named Samoyoff, stationed at Kharkoff, recently engaged a governess for the education of his daughter. The governess was the sister of a Nihilist, and brought up her pupil in her brother's political opinions. The brother was arrested during the students' riots at Kharkoff; and the General shortly afterward received an anonymous letter stating that his daughter was a Nihilist, that there were compromising papers in her desk, and that the authorities would be informed of this if the General did not endeavor to obtain the immediate liberation of the arrested student. The General looked into his daughter's desk, and, finding that the papers referred to were really there, set the student at liberty.

—A young man in the full uniform of a Procurateur's secretary called on the Governor General of Charkow. Courteously saluting, said he: "M. the Procurateur begs your Excellency to be so good as to come at once to his office." "Anything very important?" was the answer. "We are on the track of Prince Krapotins' murderer, and your Excellency's presence is most necessary." "Good! I will ring and order the carriage." "Pray do not trouble to do so. The Procurateur has sent his own carriage for your Excellency that no time be lost; everything depends on expeditiousness." The Governor and the young man got into the carriage, drove off, and have not since been seen. The Governor had himself fallen into the hands of the Nihilists. The head of police has since got a letter from the captured Governor imploring him not to prosecute the search for Krapotins' assassin, as success in this direction would be followed by the loss of his (the Governor's) head, who is held as a hostage.

—A recent letter from Warsaw says: "The secret revolutionary government in Russia is divided into a great number of sections, each of which consists of from ten to fifteen members and a chief (starosta), and acts independently of the others. The object of this arrangement is that, when one of the sections has been discovered and its members captured by the police, the other sections should be able to continue their operations unhindered. The members of the sections are continually being changed, and they hold their sittings in various places, sometimes in a public room, but chiefly in the houses of the initiated. The various sections of the secret government are under a "General," who from time to time gives out a password by which the members of a section may know each other. Each section has the right of pronouncing sentence of death upon dangerous or suspected persons and is instructed to enter into as close relations as possible with the members of high society in the empire. One of the means adopted for doing this is the placing of women belonging to the Nihilist conspiracy as governesses in the families of high imperial functionaries. The daughters of wealthy Russians are usually given up entirely to the management of their governesses, and in this way many girls of the best families have been gained over to the Nihilist cause."

Food.

The use of food by different persons should be regulated in quantity or character, or in both, according to their ages, their health and occupations, the seasons and the climate in which they live.

Milk is the only perfect food for infants. It is the best food for children and youth up to the age of 16. Old people are weaker in their digestive powers, partly because their whole systems are weaker, and partly because of their diminished muscular activity. Their food should be less in quantity than that used by younger persons, and of easier digestion.

In summer and in warm climates less food by one-third is needed, the tone of the system being lowered, and persons thus being unable either to digest or to assimilate as much as in winter and in colder latitudes.

So also fat, sugar and starch—the latter include fine flour—being mainly heat-making elements, should be but little used in summer and in tropical regions, and largely used in winter and in cold climates. Corn bread, which contains a large per cent. of fat, is better adapted for food in winter than in summer.

Shoemakers, tailors and people of sedentary habits generally need less food, that is more easily digested, than the farmer and all persons who work hard in the open air. Still, everybody should have enough of active exercise to be able to digest a generous diet.

A thinker needs a good supply of brain food, such as is liberally furnished in oatmeal; but he must not use his brain at the expense of vigorous muscles, for it is muscles that have to work not only the stomach but the lungs and heart.

The sick, of course, need food carefully adapted to their particular condition, and those who are not in full health may greatly help themselves by rejecting whatever they find injurious to them.

Snakes.

The following snakes were killed near Liberty, Ill., the other day: Black snakes, or racers, fifty-four; timber, or forest snakes, fifteen; garters, twenty-seven; chicken snake, one; house snakes, two; supposed hoop snake, one. The largest snake was six feet long, the smallest was only eight inches long. Each snake was carefully and correctly measured. The total measurement was 282 feet one inch, or an average of nearly thirty-four inches.—St. Louis Republican.

One-half million of Archbishop Purcell's liabilities were wiped out by the congregation of St. Paul's Catholic Church in Cincinnati. The sum due the congregation amounted to just $1,000,000. A resolution directing that, as the worshipers in St. Paul's believed it impossible for the Archbishop to pay off the immense debt, they unanimously pledged themselves to remit one-half their claims was adopted.

OLD TIMES.

How People Lived Fifty Years Ago and How They Live Now.

[C. C. Coffin, in May Atlantic.]

A half century ago a large part of the people of the United States lived in houses unpainted, unplastered and utterly devoid of adornment. A well-fed fire in the yawning chasm of a huge chimney gave partial warmth to a single room, and it was a common remark that the inmates were roasting one side while freezing the other; in contrast a majority of the people of the older States now live in houses that are clap-boarded, painted, blinded and comfortably warmed. Then the household furniture consisted of a few plain chairs, a plain table, a bedstead made by the village carpenter. Carpets there were none. To-day few are the homes, in city or country, that do not contain a carpet of some sort, while the average laborer by a week's work may earn enough to enable him to repose at night upon a spring bed.

Fifty years ago the kitchen "dressers" were set forth with a shining row of pewter plates. The farmer ate with a buck-handled knife and an iron or pewter spoon, but the advancing civilization has sent the plates and spoons to the melting-pot, while the knives and forks have given place to nickel or silver-plated cutlery.

In those days the utensils for cooking were a dinner-pot, tea-kettle, skillet, Dutch oven and frying-pan; to-day here is no end of kitchen furniture.

The people of 1830 sat in the evening in the glowing light of a pitch-knot fire, or read their weekly newspapers by the flickering light of a "tallow dip;" now, in city and village, their apartments are bright with the flame of the gas-jet or the softer radiance of kerosene. Then, if the fire went out upon the hearth, it was rekindled by a coal from a neighboring hearth, or by flint, steel and tinder. Those who indulged in pipes and cigars could light them only by some hearthstone; to-day we light fire and pipes by the dormant fire-works in the match-safe at a cost of one-hundredth of a cent.

In those days we guessed the hour of noon, or ascertained it by the creeping of the sunlight up to the "noon mark" drawn upon the floor; only the well-to-do could afford a clock. To-day, who does not carry a watch? and, as for clocks, you may purchase them at wholesale, by the cart-load, at 62 cents apiece.

Fifty years ago how many dwellings were adorned with pictures? How many are there now that do not display a print, engraving, chromo, or lithograph? How many pianos or parlor organs were there then? Reed organs were not invented till 1840, and now they are in every village.

Some who may read this article will remember that in 1830 the Bible, the almanac and the few text-books used in school were almost the only volumes of the household. The dictionary was a volume four inches square and an inch and a half in thickness. In some of the country villages a few public-spirited men had gathered libraries containing from 300 to 500 volumes; in contrast, the public libraries of the present, containing more than 10,000 volumes, have an aggregate of 10,650,000 volumes, not including the Sunday-school and private libraries of the country. It is estimated that altogether the number of volumes accessible to the public is not less than 20,000,000! Of Webster's and Worcester's dictionaries, it may be said that enough have been published to supply one to every 100 inhabitants of the United States.

An Immense Cattle Ranche.

They have some pretty big farms out West, but the largest of them dwindles into comparative insignificance beside one which is just being established in Colorado. This is the consolidation of the Hermosilla and Huerfano cattle ranches in the southern part of that State into one immense stock farm, which will run along both banks of the Huerfano river, between forty and fifty miles, and cover something over one hundred thousand acres. P. T. Barnum has been interested in the Huerfano ranche for about ten years, in company with a fellow-townsman of Bridgeport, Ct., named Sherwood, who put into the firm the knowledge of raising cattle while the showman furnished the cash. They have made a very good thing of the speculation, but Sherwood finally wanted to extend operations through a stock company, and Barnum concluded to sell out. This was something over a year ago, and since then Sherwood has been working away till now he has joined William H. Vanderbilt, John B. Dutcher and some other capitalists with him in the Colorado Cattle Company, which combines the old Barnum-Sherwood property with the adjoining and much larger Hermosilla ranche, and proposes to go into the business on a bigger scale than was ever before attempted. Barnum and Sherwood have had as many as five or six thousand cattle on their farm, but the new company expects to increase the number to at least fifty thousand. "There's millions in it," according to Barnum, for the Bridgeport firm have raised oxen until they were ready for market at a cost of only $4 a head, and the expense of herders, which is the chief bill, will be proportionately diminished with larger herds. Then, too, the new company will raise grain and fatten the cattle, which will make them worth $55 to $65 a head, instead of the $32 to $36 which Barnum and Sherwood have got for theirs. Vanderbilt is expected to run his new enterprise in connection with his railroads, of course, and go into the business of exporting beef on an immense scale. Altogether, it really seems to be a pretty big thing.—Philadelphia Times.

A Very Old Woman.

There died in New Haven, Ct., lately, a colored woman named Elizabeth Hendrickson, who claimed, and was supported by relatives and friends in her claim, that she was 113 years old. She was well known, and in 1876 she attended the Loan Exhibition of Relics, and was an object of curiosity to many people. There are no trustworthy records upon which to determine her age. A man died not long ago at the age of 80 years, whom she said she nursed when he was an infant. She had been married three times, and had children by her first husband, but they died of old age some years ago. Her recollections she gave in incoherent and fragmentary talk, but she claimed to have helped, when 10 years of age, put out a fire in New Jersey caused by British soldiers during the Revolutionary war. She was a small woman, and certainly had the appearance of very great age.

INDIANA NEWS.

Efforts are making to arrange for an old settlers' meeting at Connersville, in the near future.

The enumeration of the children of school age at Fortville shows 226 in a total population of 685.

The Indiana State Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was in session at Indianapolis last week.

The Vincennes Driving Association will hold its summer meeting on July 2, 3 and 4. Purses amounting to $500 for each day are offered.

Scarlet fever is raging among the children of Evansville. A number of those attending the public schools have been stricken down with it.

Strange N. Cragan, of Whitestown, has received the appointment as cadet to West Point. Thirty-one young men from five counties were examined.

The Indianapolis physicians indulge in a "black list," and keep the profession in other cities informed of the advent into their midst of medical dead-beats.

Smith Barron, living at Clayton, has a natural curiosity in the way of a cow with six feet and legs. She has perfect use of them, is well developed and healthy, and gives good milk.

A bag of Mexican dollars was found in a cellar at Indianapolis, by the workmen who were cleaning it out. They were of various dates, some as far back as 1702, but they were bogus.

The body of a boy named Newman was found in a well at Mount Vernon recently. The boy had been missing for several days. He was 8 years old, a nephew of the former Sheriff of the county.

Lewis Edwards, Sr., of Alquina, Fayette county, died a few days ago, the remote cause of his death being a bite from a rat, received early last winter, and from which he has constantly suffered since.

Gen. George K. Steele, for many years a prominent Republican in Indiana politics, and who represented Parke county a long time in the Legislature, died at Terre Haute a few days ago, 70 years of age.

A young man named William Morgansen, of Smyrna township, was terribly injured, while out gunning the other afternoon, by the accidental discharge of his gun. Several of the shots entered his throat and breast.

Geo. Hazzard, the ex-Auburn banker, who was arrested at Logansport last fall and gave bail for highway robbery in abstracting some papers belonging to himself in the possession of others, has been tried and acquitted in the Circuit Court.

Harrison and Riley Stone, brokers, charged with various robberies committed in the vicinity of Eaton, Ohio, were arrested near Terre Haute one day last week, after both had been shot by officers while running. Riley has two balls in his arm and Harrison was shot in the back. The latter will probably die.

A spiritual idiot named Valentine Kelly is engaged in digging for gold on Silver creek, two miles east of New Albany, being directed in his work by a female spiritual medium at Louisville, to whom he pays $2 per day for instructions. He proposes to keep on digging till his money is exhausted.

Mrs. Eleanor B. Whitesell was buried at Knightstown a few days ago. She was one of the pioneers of Henry county, having resided at Knightstown continuously for forty-seven years. She was a native of Springfield, Ohio, and was 68 years old when she died. Her father, Hon Waitsel M. Cary, settled in Henry county in 1825, and three years after laid out the town of Knightstown.

How He Beat Him.

A reminiscence of Chicago. This, by the way, was when the people out there were naughty, a many years ago. A hackman had caught a particularly verdant backwoodsman, and, as business had been just a trifle dull, it occurred to him that he might now make amends for fortune's slight, and at the same time give country some wholesome experience—something that would be of lasting value on his earthly pilgrimage. Arrived at the Western depot, Jehu opened the door, and out stepped country. How much was it was asked. Said Jehu, hurriedly, and, in a low voice, "You see that feller over there in a blue coat?—'sh!" pointing to a policeman. Yes, country saw him. "Well, him and me are pardners; and he's a tough one, he is. I ought ter charge ye $7.50; he would. But I've kinder taken to you, I have, and I sha'n't charge yer but an even $7. Now, don't let on. If pard knows it, he'll make yer fork over the other half; he ain't like me—not a bit." The $7 was paid over with a chuckle, and country got aboard the cars. But every now and then would he put his head out of the window, give a knowing look at the policeman, and then pound the car-cushion with his monstrous fist, while within seemed to be the beginnings of a small earthquake. At last the cars started. He could hold in no longer. Craning his neck through the window, he put his thumb to his nose, and, wriggling his fingers violently, screamed out, "I say, there! Seven dollars for a ride from t'other depot! Seven dollars! Don't yer wish yer had thur half?"—Boston Transcript.

The scaffolding that has remained for fifty-six years around the tower of Rouen Cathedral, in France, was removed a few days ago, the lantern having at length been completely restored.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, MAY 22, 1879.

THEODORE REED, ROB. J. LOWRY, EDITORS.

Mr. Henry James' new story, to begin in the Midsummer Holiday Scribner, is entitled "Confidence."

Why is not rebel Jeff Davis as good as Old Zach Chandler? Is not one traitor to his country as good as another?

Those who desire to read the full text of Hayes' last veto message, will find it on another page of this paper.

The democratic party favors free ballots. The freedom-hating republican party favors free bullets. Let the country chose between them.

Rev. Thomas McIntyre, who has been superintendent of the deaf and dumb institute of this state for the past twenty-six years, has been removed, and Dr. William Glenn, of Muncie, appointed instead.

The vast amount of money stolen from the colored people through the Freedmen's Bank, by thieving radicals, might be donated to their colored brothers now suffering for want of food and shelter in Kansas, who have been induced to leave their homes in the south, for political purposes.

At New Albany, Ind., the Catholic Total Abstinence society has resolved not to celebrate the Fourth of July by a pic-nic, for the reason that the bishop has ordered that no dancing be allowed at church pic-nics. The bishop also prohibits beer and liquors at all pic-nics held by members of the Catholic church.

Names of prominent democrats throughout the state are already being suggested as being probable candidates for governor. Among those most prominent we find Hon. Frank Landers, Lieut-Governor J. P. Gray, Hon. J. D. New, congressman from the fourth district, Hon. W. A. Holman and Hon. J. R. Coffroth.

The Grant boom, and the negro exodus boom, have boomed their boom. Grant enthusiasm has lost its grip, and thousands of negroes have lost all their property, and are now begging to be sent back to the south. So much for the efforts of the radical party to dissolve the union. The republican leaders of to-day, are worse than the rebel leaders of 1861.

Away along in the dim uncertain future—on the first of January, 1880, Reub Williams proposes to change the form of the Indianian from a four to an eight page paper. We knew Reub would come to it after a while; his enterprise in the newspaper business will never allow him to get behind the times. About 1881 he will begin to appreciate the benefits of "patents."

An act approved March 31st, 1879, authorizes town boards to tax dogs, for corporation purposes, at not exceeding $1.00 on males, and $3.00 on females. In view of the fact that Auburn is cursed with several hundred worthless canines, we submit to the town board, that in making the levies for the present year, dogs should be taxed to the full extent of the law. Persons who own dogs of any value will not object to paying the tax.

We see frequent accounts of negroes marrying white women, but it won't do in Indiana. On Tuesday of this week, at Terre Haute, William Nelson, colored, was sentenced to the penitentiary for one year, and to pay a fine of $1000, for marrying a white woman. The prosecution was originated in spite, but he was convicted under an old law of 1856, which Juge Long held to be valid through a decision of the supreme court.

An article concerning "the grain business in Auburn," which appeared in the Republican of last week, was evidently written by some person who does not understand the situation. The question, whether we are to allow all the small villages surrounding us to outbid us, is one which can be answered more satisfactorily as contemplated changes in shipping facilities are developed. Those who are posted fully understand the difficulties with which our shippers have to contend. That which interests farmers most, just at this time, is the wool market, which is controlled by entirely different principles; if our merchants will manifest a little interest in that direction they will not only benefit themselves, but the reputation of our market as well.

Gov. St. John, of Kansas, in a communication printed in the Philadelphia Times, states that, after investigating the subject carefully, he finds that only 3,000 negroes have arrived in the state from the south, and that 2,000 of these are paupers, who will have to be supported. The governor, who is a red-hot republican and exodus man, admits that the negroes have been greatly deceived, and that to locate them on the public lands it will require an outlay of about $200 for each family. The stalwarts in Kansas can't stand this drain on their pockets, and St. John gives the reader to understand that, although he regards the exodus as "the work of God's hand" and a "great blessing," he would rather see the black blessings go off to some other state.

In a suit in the supreme court of Massachusetts, brought by Chas H. Worthen, formerly a clerk for Field, Leiter & Co., of Chicago, the jury returned a verdict for $26,500 against the Grand Trunk railway, last Friday, for injuries received while traveling over that road some four years ago. It pays, now and then, to get demolished.

Has it occurred to the minds of the Auburn people, that there is almost double the business done in Auburn now than there was a year ago? At that time not less than six first-class business rooms were vacant; to-day there is but one not rented. This is not due, however, to any exertion of the citizens, who seem to be inclined to let public enterprise take care of itself; no inducements have been held out to encourage strangers to locate here, but fortunately the natural advantages of an important railroad center, have attracted the attention of observing, wide-awake business men, and the result is now being made apparent by the demand for business rooms by men from other places. This being the case, would it not be advisable for our men of means to take some steps to encourage the location of manufacturing establishments? No one will undertake to dispute the fact that Auburn has many advantages worthy the consideration of manufacturers contemplating a change of location; it is only necessary to make this fact known by correspondence or otherwise, and when strangers come here to examine the situation, offer every possible inducement to secure the benefits to be derived through the employment of a large force of workmen.

The Inter-Denominational Congress.

The Executive Committee for the Sunday School Inter-denominational Congress met at Rome City on Monday last. The reports brought in were very flattering. The committee that had consulted with the president of the G. R. & I. R. R. reported terms and conditions entirely satisfactory. The conductor, Rev. Gillett, of Sturgis, was not prepared to report a full programme, but enough eminent and able lecturers and instructors had been engaged to ensure success in that line. The distinguished oriental traveler, Rev. Ostrander, who has for months entertained large audiences in New York City and Brooklyn with illustrative lectures on oriental life, has promised to come, as has also Frank Beard, the "Chalk Talker," who is almost the equal of Nast with the pencil. He illustrates his lessons by chalk pictures drawn on the spot. Others, distinguished as normal Sunday-school instructors and public lecturers, will be engaged this week, so that a full programme will be given the public at an early day.

It was concluded to continue the session four days, commencing June 10th. The first day will be a grand excursion and inauguration day, and will be principally devoted to the entertainment of the children. The other days will be devoted to institute work, more especially for Sunday school teachers and older pupils, though there will be a public lecture every day, and exercises for the smaller children. A pavilion tent capable of holding some 800 people, and a number of camping tents were ordered to be rented for the occasion. In order to aid in meeting the heavy bill of costs that will be incurred it was decided to charge an admittance fee of 10 cents per day for adults and youths, children under 12 years, 3 for ten cents. This will be a mere pittance for the amount of instruction and entertainment that will be given. The admittance ticket will entitle the holder to roam at pleasure upon the grounds, and to all the lectures, lessons, and exhibitions, &c., on the island, under the control of the congress.

Committees were appointed to procure, if possible, excursion rates on the L. S. & M. S. R. R., the Baltimore & Ohio R. R., and the Eel River R. R., and to invite the people along the lines of these roads. Committees were also appointed to secure lodgings for visitors at Rome City, Wolcottville, Kendallville and Lagrange. Trains are expected to run so that people can leave the grounds, if not prepared to remain at night, after the last service of each day, and go to any of these places for lodging and return the next morning.

The occasion is intended to give all who will attend the best possible opportunity for a few days of recreation, and a class of such entertaining and useful instruction that it will itself be recreation to hear.

A new steam-boat and some thirty or more oar-boats will be at the service of the people at a reasonable fee. This, though, will be independent of the congress.

The grounds have recently been greatly improved. A number of flowing fountains have been put in, a large restaurant building erected, croquet grounds prepared, boat wharfs erected, &c. In a new boat-house on the east side of the island are sixteen new and handsome row-boats. The shady groves on the several islands and on the shore of the lake, boat rides of from one to six miles, flowing mineral springs of excellent quality, good fishing facilities, together with the feast of good things to be furnished by the congress, ought to be enough to attract the weary, in mind and body, as well as the young and the vigorous, for a few days of pleasure and profitable instruction.—Lagrange Standard.

Periodicals.

BRITISH QUARTERLY.

The April number of the British Quarterly Review has been promptly republished by the Leonard Scott Publishing Co., 41 Barclay Street, New York.

The first article, "Christian Theology and the Modern Spirit," advocates a frank recognition and examination of the theological scepticism and unrest of our times.

"The Ethics of Urban Leaseholds" shows the bad influence of leasehold tenure on metropolitan and urban buildings.

"Wycliffe and his Relation to the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century" gives a carefully written account of the life, opinion, and surrounding of that great reformer.

"Free Trade and Protection" is a timely article.

"The Normans at Palermo," a valuable historical article, by Edward A Freeman.

"The Zulu War." A contribution based on some practical knowledge of South Africa.

"Contemporary Literature" gives, as usual, a full account of the principal books published during the preceding quarter.

LONDON QUARTERLY.

We have the reprint of the April number of the London Quarterly Review from The Leonard Scott Publishing Co., 41 Barclay street, N. Y.

The leading article is on "The Speaker's Commentary on the Old Testament."

The article "Brugsch's History of Egypt" gives some very valuable information, especially in its connection with the narratives in Genesis and Exodus.

The other articles are "Michael Angelo and his Age;" "Agrarian Distress and Discontent in India;" "Pym and Shaftesbury: two Popish Plots;" "Secret Correspondence of Louis XV;" "Early English History: Professors Stubbs and Bright;" "Lord Carnarvon's Agamemnon and General Schomberg's Odyssey;" "The South African Problem."

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR JUNE.

Harper's Magazine for June begins the fifty-ninth volume and the thirtieth year of that periodical. To a new generation of readers it appears in a new dress—in larger type, and with a wider page. This is the third change which has been made in the type of the Magazine—each being an improvement.

The contents of the June number are especially attractive. They bring about the reader the atmosphere of summer days. They are bright, amusing, and restful. There could hardly be more enjoyable reading than Mr. W. R. O'Donovan—one of our most promising young sculptors—gives us in his "Rye and round there," illustrated with Mr. Abbey's charming drawings beautifully engraved. This opening article is followed by a graceful full-page picture by Abbey, illustrating Herrick's lines "Upon a Virgin Kissing a Rose." Then, by way of contrast, we are taken beyond the Red River of the North into that mysterious land of magnificent distances—the territory of the Hudson Bay company—and brought face to face with the fur-traders, the half-breeds, the trappers, and their picturesque life. Whether portraying the exciting scenes of barter at a trading-post, or following the Great Nor' ern Packet, which carries the mail in dog-sledges from Fort Garry, three thousand miles northward to the Upper Yukon, Mr. H. M. Robinson, the writer of the article, gives us striking and characteristic pictures, which are ably supplemented by Mr. Rogers's effective illustrations.

By another leap we are transported—in the last of Colonel Waring's "Berg und Thal" series—to the Dolomites of Southeastern Tyrol.

From Nature we turn again to pictures and scenes of greater human interest in Olive Logan's "Grand Days of Histrionics," illustrated with portraits of Nell Gwynne, Anne Oldfield, David Garrick, Peg Woffington, Miss Rich (Hogarth's god-daughter), John Kemble, Mrs. Jordan, R. W. Elliston, Edmund Kean, and Dowton—many of these being reproductions of paintings by distinguished artists.

For downright humor, there has been nothing in magazine literature since Rose Terry Cooke's "Known a" equal to Mr. James T. Fields's "A Free Lecture Experience," which is accompanied by characteristic illustrations.

SCRIBNER FOR JUNE.

The modern quality of Scribner's Monthly, which has been recently remarked upon by a critic, is fully sustained by the June issue, which is unhackneyed, up to the times, and full of points.

The opening paper on "The Fine Arts at the Paris Exposition" has been delayed by the late arrival of some of the most interesting of the illustrations, which include drawings made specially for the magazine by Vedder, the sculptor St. Gaudens, Maitland Armstrong, C. C. Coleman, and T. Hovenden.

The first of several papers on "Edison and his Inventions," by Mr. Edwin M. Fox, is devoted to the electro-motograph and its applications. This is perhaps the most complete account of this important invention, which involves the discovery of an entirely new property of electricity.

A first installment of "Madame Bonaparte's Letters from Europe" is contributed by Mr. E. L. Didier.

"Lawn Planting for City and country" is the subject of a practical paper by Mr. Samuel. Jr., of Flushing L. I.

"The Mediterranean of America" is the second of Mr. Herbert H. Smith's papers on Brazil. Mr. Champney's illustrations drawn from personal observation, keep pace with the narration, displaying many hitherto unpictured scenes.

"With Stonewall Jackson," Mr. A. C. Redwood, is a spirited account of the Confederate side of the second Manassas campaign, in which the writer was a participant.

The fiction of this number consists of "Mr. Neelus Peeler's Conditions," a story of the South by Mr. Richard M. Johnston with an illustration by Mr. Thomas Eakins; "Was it Love, or Hatred?" a Western story by Mr. Charles de Kay; the concluding part of Miss Trafton's New England story, "A Narrow Street," and the eighth installment of Mrs. Burnett's "Haworth's, illustrated by Dielman.

ST. NICHOLAS FOR JUNE.

Has a seasonable frontispiece entitled Summer has Come, and opens with A Second Trial, a story by Sarah Winter Kellogg, showing how a devoted little girl saved her big brother's fame at a College Commencement.

Louisa M. Alcott tells stories in one under the title Two Little Travelers, describing first the voyage of a tender-hearted little girl to Fayal, and its results, and then the wonderful journey of a tiny five-year-old tot, all by herself, over four thousand miles of continent and ocean.

The other short tales deal with the queer doings of Bossy Ananias, a Southern negro boy who loved curious pets; with some Pennsylvania country people and a wise pig at a Schnitzen; with Queen Bess; with The Royal Bonbon, boy-soldiers of the terrible French Revolution; and with A Comet that Struck the Earth—and some boys—in the far West, years ago. The eight illustrations to these stories, particularly that to The Royal Bonbon, which is by Walter Shirlaw, are specially attractive.

Very small readers have a large-type story, with seven pictures, about Two Little Mothers; and Jack-in-the-Pulpit, The Letter-Box and The Riddle-Box contain things piquant, playful and puzzling for readers of all tastes and all ages.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE FOR MAY.

Republished by the Leonard Scott Publishing Co., 41 Barclay street, N. Y., contains as follows:

Reata; or, what's in a name. Part II.
Some aspects of the present French republic.
John Caldigate. Part XIV.
The Pathans of the north west frontier of India.
The life of the Prince Consort.
The policy of the budgett.
Public affairs.

In Reata there is a marked contrast between the descriptions in the first and the second chapters, but the writer seems to get somewhat confused when he speaks of the Canadian vine, that most beautiful of tropical creepers.

The discussion on the present condition of France, and what can be said against and for the republic, concludes that it is not a bad specimen of a republic—as republics go.

Quite a long description is given of the Pathans, a semi barbarous people, who live in caves or rude huts among the mountains of India.

The fourth volume of the Life of the Prince Consort contains less of political and more of social life than the third

The Policy of the Budget, refers to England politics, and public affairs, to her relations with the outside world.

THE BLUE RIBBON.

State Temperance Ticket Repudiated —Election of Officers—Resolutions, etc.

The state blue ribbon convention at Indianapolis last week, among other resolutions, adopted the following:

Resolved, that no sectarian or partisan lines be drawn, and we welcome all men of whatever creed or political faith to our ranks. And further,

Whereas, the temperance movement originated in earnest efforts for personal reformation, and rests its hope of success on moral and religious grounds; therefore,

Resolved, that we are opposed to the use of the ribbon movement for political purposes, either for or against any political party, and we disapprove the call made for a temperance convention to nominate candidates for political offices as unwise and premature,

Resolved, that while we desire stringent laws for the suppression of the evils of intemperance, and will rejoice in the total prohibition of the liquor traffic, we demand that all questions of nominations, or other political action, be submitted to the free choice of all temperance people.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

President—H. W. Harrington, Indianapolis.

Vice Presidents—J. C. Kensell, Fort Wayne; Walter March, Muncie; G. M. Otterman, Terre Haute.

Treasurer—R. Frank Kennedy, Indianapolis.

Corresponding secretary—James S. Walsh, Greenfield.

Board of managers—D. T. Smith, Bluffton; R. T. Long, Galveston; Dr. Pitchlynn, Greencastle; —— Williams, Franklin; Rev. John Wyman, Evansville.

The following resolutions were also adopted.

1. That it is not practicable to dissolve existing temperance organizations or secure one which shall supersede them all, and make no recommendation to that effect.

2. We recommend what this union perfect its organization, and conduct its work in its own way—not as the rival, but as the helper of all other temperance bodies.

3. We recommend that the executive committees of all the state temperance organizations of Indiana hold a joint meeting, on call of the president of this union, and agree on a plan of operation for concentration and expression of temperance sentiment and work.

4. We recommend that this co-operative executive meeting call a mass meeting of the temperance people of the state at some time during the proposed Laport, temperance camp meeting.

And now it is a young lady of twenty, a beautiful brunette, highly educated and of "one of the first families." She lives near Pittsburg, and was married, Thursday of last week, to a burly nigger coal-digger named George Jones, who had once been in her family's employ. The girl's name is Annie Mason; she deliberately united herself to the negro because she had been slightly reproved for some waywardness, and she refuses to return home—to a home of ease and luxury. What will the next "beautiful and accomplished" belle do?

Advantages Decided.

The advantages in the use of Dr. Price's Special Flavoring Extracts are decided, as they are put up in bottles of full measure; made from the true fruits and aromatics, without poisonous oils or ethers, pure and true.

NO MATTER HOW HIGH THE "TONE."

WHEN A TAILOR

No matter how high up his "tone" is, asks you $10 and $14 for a pair of "trousers," as he calls them, the wool of which is sorted by orphans and poor blind girls, and is kept some years in some old mill in Germany before he buys it on credit; when this noble tailor stands off and views you, enveloped in one of his $35 suits, gesticulating like a maniac, you may think here is a little humbug about it all, but it is not humbug; it is just twenty dollars out of your pocket into his'n. There is a place where you can get precisely the same suit for—well, you call on

Local and Miscellaneous

—Where, oh, where is the hook-and-ladder truck?

—The Saginaw road changes time next Sunday.

—M. C. Markle left for Bloomington, Ill., yesterday.

—Geo. Foster says he is going to start a first national bank.

—Walking shoes, all prices and styles, at the boot up-side down.

—Cherries will be abundant this season. Glad of it; we love 'em.

—Mace Long passed through the city yesterday, on his way to Jackson.

—The B. & O. employes are now healed, or ought to be. Tuesday was payday.

—Miss Susie Parish, of Huron, O., is in the city, visiting Miss Sadie Hollister.

—T. C. Ford added a handsome new single carriage to his livery barn last Monday.

—The summer harvest of straw hats gives an immense yield and is now fully matured.

—The hardest pressed thing we know of, even in these hard times, is a bale of hay.

—We had a photograph of the boot up-side down taken; the boot is right-side up.

—Fresh and fashionable millinery goods received every week at Mrs. A. J. Little's.

—Robert McDougal started Tuesday for Indianapolis, where he will attend the grand lodge.

—P. B. Loomis, president of the Saginaw road, passed through Friday, on his way to Jackson.

—For tender meat, go to Houston's meat market, you are always sure to get what you want.

—Ladies, have you examined the new line of parasols and sun-shades just received at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's.?

—Ladies will find it to their interests, when in search of any handsome article in the millinery line, to call on Mrs. A. J. Little.

—Extensive arrangements are being made for the observance of decoration day in Auburn. See programme in another column.

—The busy season for the farmers does not seem to effect trade at Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. Low prices always command custom.

—One of the Saginaw engines flew the track Tuesday morning at the junction, delaying the train some two hours. No material damage.

—Messrs. Murphy & Baldwin did a very neat job of kalsomining on the restaurant last week, and they did it in short meter, too.

—People of DeKalb county, who have cash to pay for goods, should come to Auburn, and get prices of Schaab, Beugnot & Co., before buying.

—Hound pups are in demand. It is said that one of our ripe old widowers went to Huntertown last Tuesday to invest $2.00 in that breed of dogs.

—Peaches and cream, we understand, will be a failure this year. Peaches will, anyway; and cream isn't a bit nice without some peaches to pour over it.

—A couple of the boys yesterday put up a job on "Kib." They toted off a basket belonging to him and "soaked" it for two cigars; when he went after the basket he had to liquidate the cigar bill.

—The programme for the 14th annual convention of the DeKalb county S. S. Union, was not furnished this office until after the COURIER was mailed last week.

—Joe Ebright, who tried to get up that sham murder at Defiance, has turned up, it is reported, in Danville, Ill., out of work, out of friends, and "broke."

—Attend the original moving mirror panorama and tableau exhibition, illustrating the renowned allegory of the pilgrims progress, at Ensley's hall next Friday evening.

—There is one business in which a man can engage without fear of opposition in the same town. Ask Jos. Rainier, our postmaster, and he will tell you what it is.

—Mitch Houston is now delivering ice to private residences in any part of the city. Ice is so cheap this year that any person can afford to use it. Call on Houston for prices.

—Mr. Wm. Sheffer desires the public to bear in mind that he has removed his shop to the room lately occupied by Mr. Rhodenbaugh, one door east of Odd Fellows' building.

—Go to Schaab, Beugnot & Co's. for anything you want in the way of dry-goods, clothing, hats, notions, groceries &c., &c. Prices lower than at any other store in the county.

—That young man's arm must have pained him terribly as he walked up Main street, Tuesday evening, with his girl; at any rate, it was "horfibly out of place,"—his arm was.

—It is generally understood in DeKalb county that Schaab, Beugnot & Co. sell all kinds of dry-goods and notions for less money than will buy the same goods at Fort Wayne.

—Somebody please tell us, and tell us right away, what earthly sense there is in demolishing the whole alphabet to spell b-o-u-q-u-e-t—bokay?

—Mr. Simon Peter went to Columbus, Ohio, one day last week.—Garrett Herald. No he didn't do any such thing. Simon Peter died long before the town of Columbus was thought of.

—There will be a rousing, first-class hop at Ensley's hall this (Thursday) evening. As it is the first one for several weeks, and may be the last, everybody should go with somebody else.

—The M. E. church is being extensively repaired and will be made beautiful. It will be completed by Sabbath, at which time the quarterly meeting will be held, to which all are invited.

—It is said that the wife of President Grevy can ride a steeplechase, paint a landscape, compose a poem and play the piano like an angel.—Ex.

Just imagine an angel riding a steeplechase!

—We have bought the Miller & Getrost stock of boots and shoes, and will sell them away below cost to close them out. Come now, and get some decided bargains at the boot up-side down.

—Spanking machines, with tripital repeaters, would undoubtedly prove a great blessing in the future to small boys who loaf around so late at night, if applied on their return home.—Ex. We think so, too, only we'd "apply it" on a different spot.

—When the doctor announced to the rich printer, who ardently desired a son and heir, that it was a girl, the man of the quill pathetically implored him to mark it "w. f." and send it back to the foundry.—Stolen.

—It is said that a teaspoonful of kerosene oil, taken internally, will cure consumption. Yes perhaps it will; and a can-full of it, taken externally while building a fire, often cures everything the patient is troubled with.

—Mr. D. H. Tolan, publisher of the Delphos, (Ohio) Herald, gave the COURIER office a call on last Monday morning. Hoosier quill-drivers are always glad to meet their Buckeye brothers. Come again, and tarry longer.

—S. Hollister was last week threatened with a return of the disease with which he not long ago suffered so intensely—paralysis. He took it right in hand, however, and we are glad to learn that it was nipped in the bud.

—The commodious store-room below the COURIER office, which has been idle for some time, has this week been rented to H. H. G. Upmeyer, of Garrett, who will remove his store from the latter place about the last of this week.

—Did you ever try to go through a doorway, in a dark room, when the "beautiful door stood ajar" and you thought it was open? Didn't, eh? Then you don't know anything about the bitterness of misplaced confidence.

—Maj. Durkee, night-watch, he of the club and revolver, kicks because he is furnished no key to the lock-up, and we are inclined to think that he is justified. What's the use of having a watchman with no place to stow away his captures?

—Will some young lady take compassion on either Smith or Leonard, at the junction, and write to him? Each is anxiously expecting a letter, and they have sent to the postoffice three times a day, for six long weeks, all to no avail.

—Rob. McClellan thinks he will "pedestrinate" for a prize next week at the walking match. In case it doesn't fall through—and present appearances indicate that it will not—the strife will commence at Ensley's hall, Friday evening, May 30th.

—Lively runaway on Main street a few days since. The driver got right out of the wagon without anybody telling him to, and he went up into the air about five feet when he did it, alighting directly in front of the wagon. A tough physique, though, saved him from damage.

—If there is any one thing more than another which has a tendency to bring gray hairs to a typo's head, it is to have some illustrious vagrant stroll into the composing room and climb up into his case, carrying on an interrogative conversation and spitting tobacco-juice, the while, in the quad box.

—A fast train on the Wabash road, a day or two ago, made the distance from Toledo to St. Louis, 432 miles, in 9 hours and 33 minutes, deducting one hour and 27 minutes for stops at Defiance, Ft. Wayne, Lafayette, Danville and Decatur. The telegraph poles must have appeared to the passengers like a tight-board fence.

—A man living at the lake where last week's fishing party from Auburn had their frolic, says that there were only two fish captured by the whole outfit. Now, how about the sixty pounds, gentlemen? Tom Mays, in whose word we have always had the most implicit confidence, says the fellow above alluded to is "another."

—Messrs. Cook and Copper have gone into the walking match scheme head over heels,—or words to that effect. They circulated a subscription paper last Monday, for the purpose of securing funds to defray expenses, in case a shortage occurs, and met with brilliant success. It was intended to have the fun begin to-morrow evening, but owing to the previous engagement of the hall, it cannot take place until Friday of next week. Names of contestants will be announced in due time.

—We are in receipt of the annual circular of the Columbia City normal school, which will open July 21st and continue six weeks. The success which has attended former sessions of the Columbia City normal, has given it a reputation second to none. Write to A. C. Mills or J. E. McDonald for circular and full particulars.

—A free book of nearly 100 large octavo pages for the sick Full of valuable notes on scrofula; diseases of the breathing organs; diseases of men; diseases of women; aches and pains; heart troubles; and a great variety of chronic diseases, with evidence that in most cases that these diseases are curable. Sent for one stamp. Address MURRAY HILL PUB. CO., No. 129 E. 28th St., N. Y. 11-6m.

—Last Wednesday night's fire, though not a particularly disastrous one, must have awakened in the minds of most of our citizens a sense of the danger we are in, in case a fire should break out in a more compact part of our little city; and such a fire will come, too, mark our word for it, when it may be least expected. "A stitch in time," etc.

—Valparaiso Messenger: "Two geese, run over and killed by some vehicle, were a prominent attraction on Main street, Sunday last."

You ought to have mentioned their names. It would be a good item to be read by people who never know when they are crossing the streets; but with the above brief notice of it, they may infer that it was only a couple of feathery bipeds.

—That gentleman was "awfully unkind" the other evening, because, in spite of the solicitations of the sweet singers across the way, he wouldn't "pull down the blind" worth a cent; and we rather guess the girls got the worst of it. But we'll name no names until next time,—that is, until next week, as we want to hunt up a few additional facts in the case.

—Fashion authorities say that the fan is no longer to be attached to the waist, but carried in the hand. Very good. But when she has six or eight yards of train in one hand and the fan in the other, and feels her back hair coming down and her hat blowing off to expose her done up bangs—under these trying circumstances, we rise to query—what's to be did with the fan?

—The jolliest fishing party that settled on the bosom of Blue River lake this many a day, arrived here from Auburn on Wednesday last, and comprised the following gentlemen: W. J. Austin, James E. Rose, J. H. Johnson, T. C. Mays, late editor of the COURIER, J. L. Davis, H. C. Peterson and R. H. Weamer, editor Republican. They brought with them a regular gypsy outfit, and such frying and spluttering, frizzing and crackling as there was at the lake was a caution. They had all the fun and all the fish they wanted, and they looked as if each man could easily stand his "inch or two of future reck'nin." When they go home and tell of the sport and success they had, we are sure 'Busco will see more of the disciples of sir Isaac Walton, this season.—Churubusco Herald.

—The Baptist church was rather uncomfortably crowded Monday night, on the occasion of the temperance lecture of Mace Long, the reformed gambler, of Fort Wayne. Considering the limited advantages he has had through life, and what most of that life has been, his talk was not a little remarkable, though nature has endowed him with a good mind and many of the finer feelings which are so often permitted, in early life, to drift into channels of vice. But even in his associations with men amongst whom he was thrown, in the years which he is now trying to redeem, his generosity and kind-heartedness was proverbial, and he is well adapted to do a good work in reclaiming those who, like him, have gone astray. His lecture here, delivered in his own plain language, was at times quite pathetic—at others, mirthful—and we have no doubt that it has been productive of much good wherever heard.

—A number of ministers and others interested in Sunday-schools, met at Rome City on the 9th of this month and organized an Inter-denominational Sunday-school Congress, the same to be held at Rome City annually. The first session to be held on the 10th, 11th and 12th days of June, next. For particulars, see article from the Lagrange Standard in another column. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President—J. H. Rerick, Lagrange.

Vice presidents—T. E. Hughes, Lagrange; Rev. Elizure Andrews, Vicksburg, Mich.; Rev. Newton Burwell, Kendallville.

Secretary—C. U. Wade, Lagrange.

Treasurer—F. P. Ford, Kendallville.

Executive committee—Wm. P. Hosler, Rome City; Rev. C. King, Wolcottville; G. F. Brothwell, Rome City; Dr. E. G. White, Lagrange; G. W. Mummert, Wawaka.

Rev. A. H. Gillett, of Sturgis, Mich., was elected conductor, and will have charge of the instruction and general management of the congress.

White Mountains Excursion.

The third annual Detroit Evening News excursion to the White Mountains will leave Detroit July 7th. The round trip, of over 2,000 miles (which will include Quebec and the seashore), will cost but $25. Tickets good for 45 days. Full particulars may be obtained by sending stamp to W. H. BREARLEY, office of the Detroit Evening News.

Of Any Value.

If the testimony of eminent chemists, and sagacious medical men, is of any value, Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is the most perfect made. These men of standing in their professions, not only recommend its use, but endorse it by using it in their own families.

Hicksville Races.

Our neighbors over at the flourishing town of Hicksville, have arranged for a June meeting of their trotting association. The meeting will be held on the 5th, 6th and 7th days of June. A good track and liberal premiums will no doubt draw a good crowd. Premium lists are now being circulated.

A Failure.

Any attempt to produce a perfume in this or any other country that can surpass Dr. Price's Unique Perfumes, will prove a failure, for Dr. Price's perfumes are as fresh and sweet as the flowers from which they are made, and cannot be improved.

Old Settlers' Meeting.

The executive committee of the Old Settlers' association of DeKalb county are requested to meet at Rose & Hartman's office, in Auburn, on Wednesday, May, 28, 1879, at 2 o'clock p. m., to perfect arrangements for the meeting to be held at Auburn on the 19th of June. It is requested that all the members of the committee should be present.

T. D. GROSS, Chairman.

Proceedings of the Town Board.

Regular session, Friday evening, May 16th, 1879. Full board present. The clerk, treasurer and marshal presented their official bonds in the amount named last week, all of which were accepted and approved by the board. On motion Mr. W. H. Dills was appointed attorney for the town, for the ensuing year. Board adjourned.

Memorial Fund.

At a meeting of the Union Soldiers' Association, last Saturday night, the following resolution was passed by a unanimous vote:

RESOLVED, That all moneys received on account of subscription for the observance of memorial day, shall be held as a special fund, sacred to that purpose. Statements of the receipts, expenditures and balances to be made following the exercises of the day, the same to be published in the newspapers of Auburn.

Floral Hall.

The officers of the N. E. Indiana Agricultural association have concluded to erect a new floral hall upon the fair grounds. The building will be octogon in form, 50 feet in diameter, and 18 feet high, with a tower in the center of the roof. It will stand nearly south of the present Agricultural and Machinery halls, and, in addition to being a great convenience, will prove a decided ornament to the grounds. The building will stand on a stone foundation, and have an inch and a half floor. The cost of the structure will be $850. Messrs. Crane, Duncan & Co., of this place have the contract, they being the lowest bidders for the work. It will be completed in ample time for the next fair.—Waterloo Press.

A New Pleasure Resort.

There is a handsome little lake, as beautifully blue as the waters of the Danube, surrounded by the foliage of a grand old forest, near the neat and enterprising town of Churubusco, on the Eel River railroad, that is rapidly gaining favor with the pleasure-loving public. A party from this place spent a day there last week, and returned well satisfied with the attractions which that vicinity offers. They were favored with good fishing, bringing home with them quite a fine catch. The place is new yet as a pleasure resort, and but few facilities are to be found for boating and fishing. We learn that the Eel River road will lay a track to the lake in a short time, and this we believe will induce a spirit of enterprise that will furnish all the accommodations needed by excursionists. When the track is laid we may look for a resort that will afford us every advantage that heart could desire. There will be a large patronage from this end of the road, and we believe that the officials interested in this matter will find it a good investment.

The Man Who Stops His paper.

Philip Gilbert Hamerton, in his admirable papers on "Intellectual Life," thus talks of the man who stopped his paper: "Newspapers are to the civilized word what the daily house talk is to the members of the family—they keep our daily interest in each other, they save us from evils of isolation. To live as a member of the great white race that has filled Europe and America and colonized or conquered whatever territory it has been pleased to occupy, to share from day to day its thoughts, its cares, its inspirations, it is necessary that every man should read his paper. Why are the French peasants so bewildered and at sea? It is because they never read a newspaper. And why are the inhabitants of the United States, though scattered over a territory fourteen times the area of France, so much more capable of concerted action, so much more alive and modern, so much more interested in new discoveries of all kinds, and capable of selecting and utilizing the best of them? It is because the newspapers penetrate everywhere, and even the lonely dweller on the prairie or in the forest is not intellectually isolated from the great current of public life which flows through the telegraph and press."

Not Horse Thieves.

There was considerable excitement created on the streets of Auburn last Sunday, by the report that a team of horses had been stolen from Mr. Ford's livery stable. The cause of the scare, as we understand it, was as follows: On Saturday evening two gentlemen registered at the Swineford house as J. H. Des Rosiers, Chicago, and A. T. McGinley, Columbia City. On the next morning (Sunday) they were joined by Geo. W. Smith, and Fred J. Murray, of Columbia City, the latter two coming in a private conveyance. About 10 o'clock Mr. Smith drove to Mr. Ford's barn, had his team put up, and hired a pair of fresh horses to go a few miles east of town. Mr. Ford soon became alarmed for the safety of his team, and dispatched several parties in pursuit. The team was found in charge of Mr. McGinley near a large tamarac swamp between Auburn and Butler. It was some time before Mr. McGinley could satisfy Deputy Sheriff Somers and others, that he (McGinley) was sheriff of Whitley county, and that his party was then in the swamp searching for stolen property believed to be secreted there. During the afternoon all parties returned to the city, the Columbia City parties claiming to have found the stolen property, which, we have since been told, consisted of a pair or two of boots wrapped up in an old lap-robe, with an old halter around it. After partaking of a hearty supper at the Swineford house, Sheriff McGinley ordered his team to be brought out, at the same time Mr. Ford presented a bill for feed and livery hire amounting to $11.00; this created a longing desire in McGinley to consult an attorney; he did so, which resulted in a compromise at $6.00, which was paid to Mr. Ford in full settlement of his bill. We hope to be able next week to give more particulars concerning the stolen property.

Shocking Murder at Fort Wayne.

On Thursday evening last, May 15, at about 8 o'clock, A. M. Webb, ex-coroner of Allen county, and for many years a respected citizen of Fort Wayne, was brutally murdered by a supposed horse-thief—shot down in his own barn at his residence a short distance west of the city. Mr. Webb had gone out to the barn, as was his custom every night, to see that all was right, when he found the man engaged in preparing to make off with a valuable horse. The man, on being asked what he wanted, said he was looking for a place to sleep, whereupon Mr. Webb ordered him out of the barn and started towards him; the man then drew a revolver and shot Webb in the abdomen, from the effects of which he died on Friday at 10 o'clock p. m. All efforts to obtain a clue to the murderer have thus far availed nothing, and it will doubtless be a difficult matter to convict any one whom they may arrest on suspicion, even if he be the right man, though Reuben Webb, a son of the murdered man, saw the thief as he was making his escape. It is indeed a sad affair, and the excitement caused in Fort Wayne by it has not abated, nor will it be likely to until the assassin has been hunted down and dealt with as he deserves.

Mr. Webb was buried in Lindenwood cemetery, at Fort Wayne, Sunday afternoon last, an immense throng of people attending, the ceremonies being conducted under the auspices of the Odd Fellows, of which he was a member.

A reward of $700 is now standing, for the arrest and conviction of the guilty party, and we trust some one may soon succeed in obtaining it.

1861. MEMORIAL. 1879.

Decoration of Soldiers' Graves at Auburn, Ind, May 30, 1879.

President of the day—Joseph Rainier.
Marshal—R. D. Elson.
Assistant Marshal—Hiram Palmer.
Chaplain—Rev. H. J. Norris.
Orator—Hon. E. D. Hartman.
Biographer—W. L. Penfield.

MUSIC

By the Corunna and Butler brass bands, and also by martial bands.

PROGRAMME.

The procession will form under the supervision of the marshal, at 1 o'clock p. m., and march to the cemetery in the following order:

1st. Corunna Band.
2d. Officers, orator, biographer and chaplain.
3d. Soldiers under command of the officers of the Union Soldiers' Association.
4th Butler band.
5th Decorating corps of 44 little girls, all daughters of soldiers.
6th. Martial bands.
7th. Citizens generally.

EXERCISES AT THE CEMETERY.

1st. Music by the Butler band.
2d. Prayer by the chaplain.
3d. Oration.
4th. Music by the Corunna band
5th. Reading names of soldiers buried in the Auburn cemetery.
6th. Decorating graves.
7th. Countermarch to the city.
8th. Disband.

RAILROAD FARE.

The Eel River road will carry passengers on the above day at one and one-fifth fare, and return—55 cents from Butler, where the train will be held until 8 o'clock a. m., to give all an opportunity to come. The Ft. W., J. & S. road will give half-rates from Angola and all stations in DeKalb county.

The patriotic citizens of DeKalb and adjoining counties are cordially invited to be present and assist in carrying out the programme. Soldiers are requested to join the ranks of the Union Soldiers' Association during the exercises.

COM. ON ARRANGEMENTS.

G. W. Gordon, Joseph McKay, W. H. McIntosh, R. H. Weamer, D. S. Ober, Joseph Rainier and John McClellan.

CLOTHING

And Furnishing Goods

To a Queen's Taste.

We employ only men who understand their business. We sell only a class of goods that we know will wear, and give satisfaction. We use only such trimmings as befit good work, and last but not least, we have the knack of fitting men, boys or children in as good, and often-time better manner, than high-toned tailors, with war-time prices. All the latest novelties are shown by us as soon as they appear, and we are usually called the C. O. D., One-Price Square Dealers, Clothiers, Men's Furnishers and Hatters, but sign ourselves,

St. Joe.

—Corn planting all done up, and farmers are therefore happy.

—J. O. Leighty has the basement of his new store-house nearly completed.

—H. Jaggers occupies a portion of his residence as a shoe-shop.

—John Leighty, wife and daughter, who have been visiting in Pennsylvania, returned home Saturday night.

—Mrs. Nichols, wife of J. R. Nichols, and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Leighty, died quite suddenly on Friday night, having been sick only one week. She leaves, besides her husband, three children and a host of friends to mourn her sad death.

—H. H. Fales & Sons contemplate starting a branch furniture store, we understand, at this place.

—Frank Hart's residence is nearly completed.

—It is amusing to see what a strife there is among the ladies of St. Joe on wash-day. We fear that some must bend the Sabbath, or the washing wouldn't be on the line so early Monday morning.

—In the account of the accident which occurred at Orangeville last week, the COURIER made a slight error in stating that Mr. Sands, the man killed, was the engineer. His name was Robert Sands, and he was employed by Jas. Hamilton as a miller.

—Some of the boys east of the river had better open up in the poultry business, as they have doubtless got a good stock on hand now. The people, however, are getting tired of it, and we learn that one of the thieves lately got in a rather bad fix. A. A. A.

Administrator's Sale.

MAN'S MORTALITY.

BY DR. O'DONOVAN.

Like as the damask rose you see,
Or like a blossom on a tree,
Or like a dainty flower in May,
Or like the morning to the day,
Or like the sun, or like the shade,
Or like the gourd which Jonah had—
Even such is man, whose thread is spun,
Drawn out and out, and so is done.
The rose withers, the blossom blasteth,
The flower fades, the morning hasteth,
The sun sets, the shadow flies,
The gourd consumes, the man—he dies.

Like the grass that's newly sprung,
Or like a tale that's new begun,
Or like the bird that's here to-day,
Or like the pearled dew in May,
Or like an hour, or like a span,
Or like the singing of a swan—
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The grass withers, the tale is ended,
The bird is flown, the dew's ascended,
The hour is short, the span not long,
The swan's near death, man's life is done.

Like to the bubble in the brook,
Or in a glass much like a look,
Or like the shuttle in weaver's hand,
Or like the writing on the sand,
Or like a thought, or like a dream,
Or like the gliding of the stream—
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The bubble's out, the look forgot,
The shuttle's flung, the writing's blot,
The thought is past, the dream is gone,
The waters glide, man's life is done.

Like to an arrow from the bow,
Or like swift course of water flow,
Or like that time 'twixt flood and ebb,
Or like the spider's tender web,
Or like a race, or like a goal,
Or like the dealing of a dole—
Even such is man, whose brittle state
Is always subject unto fate.
The arrow shot, the flood soon spent,
The time no time, the web soon rent,
The race soon run, the goal soon won,
The dole soon dealt, man's life soon done.

Like to the lightning from the sky,
Or like a post that quick doth hie,
Or like a quarter in a song,
Or like a journey three days long,
Or like the snow when summer's come,
Or like the pear, or like the plum—
Even such is man, who heaps up sorrow,
Lives but this day, and dies to-morrow.
The lightning's past, the post must go,
The song is short, the journey so,
The pear doth rot, the plum doth fall,
The snow dissolves, and so must all.

A BOW-STREET RUNNER'S DANGER.

I was ordered to take charge of a prisoner to be discharged the next day from one of the local jails, in which he had been undergoing a year's imprisonment for a criminal assault. The man had been let out on a ticket-of-leave from the Defense hulk at Woolwich, and had speedily, as it appeared, got into trouble down in the country. As he was "wanted" to complete his original sentence—having broken his ticket-of-leave—there could be no bother about apprehending him inside his prison, and using such precautions for his safe keeping as seemed best to my judgment.

Just as I was about to leave the office in Bow street, one of my comrades with whom I was rather intimate came in, having finished a journey such as I was myself about to set off on. "Going out, Tom?" he asked; and, on my telling him where I was bound for, he continued: "Better have this 'barker,' Tom; you may find it useful." At the same time he produced a small pocket-pistol, which he held out for my acceptance. "I have not got any powder," he added; "but here are some caps and bullets." It seems needless to remark that this was before the days of revolvers and patent cartridges; we had then to load in the old fashion, and had merely got as far as the introduction of the percussion cap. I had never before carried anything more deadly by way of protection than a life-preserver; but, as my friend seemed to mean a kindness, I made no ado about accepting his offer; and, having "capped" the pistol there and then, I consigned it to the side-pocket of a pilot-coat, which I wore buttoned over my uniform.

My journey down to Suffolk calls for no particular notice. In due time the railway deposited me at my destination, and left me with ample leisure to call upon the Governor of the prison over night, with a view to arranging for my carrying off my charge in the morning. I asked what sort of a customer I would have to deal with, and must confess I did not feel much encouraged by the reply.

"He is what I would call a nasty customer," was the answer. "He has given us a deal of trouble while we have had charge of him; continually breaking prison rules, and more than once he has tried to commit suicide in the most determined manner by tearing open the veins in his arms with his finger nails."

This account of matters was not, as may well be supposed, at all enlivening; and when the Governor added that the man was a perfect giant, and had been a 'navvy' before he fell into evil courses, I began to fear that my work was cut out for me. However, there was no help for it. We Bow-street runners had as fickle customers to deal with as any of your modern detectives. All I could do was to ask that the prisoner should be detained until I got over in the morning. I told the Governor where I had put up: but he did not seem disposed to offer me his company for an hour or two in the evening, and to me he hardly appeared the sort of a man I could ask in an off-hand way to take a friendly glass; so, my arrangements being thus far completed, I there and then left him.

The inn where I had taken up my quarters stood right opposite the jail entrance, and, as the street was somewhat of the narrowest, the most complete view of all comers and goers could be commanded from the front of my temporary residence. As my landlady knew the errand I had come on, and had a most becoming respect for the representative of the law, she kindly accommodated me with her own private parlor as a sitting-room; and a very pleasant evening I spent in the company of the intelligent daughter of the house, business leaving her mother but little time to bestow upon me. Next morning found me seated at a very comfortable breakfast, and, the weather being fine, the window of the private parlor was opened, affording a perfect view of all that might take place at the prison door opposite. While I was absorbed in the good cheer before me, I was startled by an exclamation from both the landlady and her daughter, which caused me to look up and instinctively to glance across the street.

"Did you ever see such a big, coarse and clumsy-looking woman?" exclaimed the younger of my entertainers.

"Or is it a woman at all?" added her mother.

My attention was at once riveted upon the new-comer, whom I somehow could not avoid connecting with the criminal it would so soon become my duty to apprehend. Without saying a word to the two ladies, I carefully and closely watched every movement of the party opposite, during the remainder of my morning meal. More than once I caught myself mentally repeating my landlady's query: "Is it a woman after all?" Then it must be excused, as the point was so entirely doubtful. For a woman, the individual was very considerably above the average height, and her whole physique indicated far more than the average strength of womankind. There was a swagger in her walk, too, most unlike the carriage of a female; and once during her pacing in front of the jail door she stopped to adjust a bootlace or some such matter in a fashion which showed an entire absence of delicacy, and at the same time showed a portion of a limb which might have done credit to an athlete's highest state of training. I was fairly puzzled, and none the less so that I had twice noticed her ringing the prison bell, and that I knew there was but one individual to be discharged that morning, and that it was close upon my time to go and look after him. I had barely finished my last cup of coffee, when one of the prison warders came across to say that the wife of my prisoner was waiting outside, and had twice made a demand to see him; but that the Governor did not care to accede to the request without first consulting me. After casting the matter over in my own mind for a minute, I told the warder that I did not mind the woman being admitted, but that the two ought to be very closely watched during the interview. The man re-entered the prison, and within a few minutes I observed that the woman was called in.

Punctual to my time, I crossed over to the prison and found my charge waiting for me, his wife being still with him, and no one in the room but the Governor. Contrary to my expectations, the prisoner held up his wrists and submitted to be handcuffed with the most lamb-like docility. When we got out into the street I suggested, as there was time to spare, that the stalwart pair should have a bit of breakfast at my expense, before starting on the journey for town. I thought the woman seemed a little taken aback at my invitation; however it was acceded to; and we entered the inner parlor, where I requested the landlady to produce a plentiful supply of ham and eggs, and, as the pair preferred ale to tea or coffee, I ordered them a pint apiece. I I had of course to unlock one hand in order to allow my prisoner the free use of his knife and fork; and, after what I had heard the night before, I thought it was rather a risky thing for me to do, as, though he might not attempt to do any mischief, it was just possible he might try to inflict some serious mischief on himself. All, however, passed off safely; and when breakfast was finished I told him he must bid his wife good-by, as I did not want to attract any attention at the railway station. A kiss was accordingly exchanged, the bracelets were again adjusted to his wrists, and we set off at a brisk pace.

When we got to the station, I learned that the next "up" train was an express, and that I would have to look sharp, as it might be expected immediately, and made but a brief stoppage. The train in fact came in almost to a minute after the information was communicated to me; and I hurried across the platform, got my man into a second-class carriage—the compartment I had only just time to notice was empty. The whistle was sounded, and the train was beginning to move, when the door was flung open, and in jumped the prisoner's wife, taking a seat right opposite me. There was but time for the porter to slam to the door when we were off. It need not be said that I was very far from being satisfied with the look of things, and that I had made up my mind to be carefully on my guard. I said nothing, being fully determined not to betray my uneasiness, though it must be owned I felt much. Before we had gone any great way, my prisoner turned sideways to me and said: "Master, my missus and me have some small matters of our own we would like to talk over; and, as they don't concern you in the least, p'raps you wouldn't mind looking out o' the winder for a minute or two while we have our talk."

"That I could not possibly do," was my immediate answer. "My duty is to keep you always under my eye and control; and, besides, as you have just said your domestic arrangements can be a matter of no concern to me, so you can discuss them as freely as you please without minding my presence."

This answer seemed to disconcert both of them; but, as if by way of compromise, I at the same time leant toward the window of the carriage for a moment, and glanced outside. My hearing is sharp enough now, but at the time I speak of was even more acute. Just as I turned my head I heard, or fancied I heard, the man whisper the words, "Both together." Instantly the suspicion flashed across my mind that these words related to myself, and I turned round and faced the couple in a moment. What I saw in the expression of each of them seemed to warrant my acting with immediate decision. I seized the man between his manacled wrists so that he could not raise has hands. With an instinctive thought I plunged my right hand into the pocket of my pilot-coat, pulled out the pistol my mate had handed me, cocked it with my thumb, and, holding it within a few inches of the face of the woman opposite, I looked steadily into her eyes, and said with emphasis: "If you attempt to stir before we reach the next station you will certainly be a dead woman."

It was something fearful to notice the immediate change on that woman's countenance. She became of a pallid whiteness, and her lips had the purple-bluish tinge that indicates so unmistakably an access of deadly fear. In the highly dramatic position I have just described we sped on until the next stopping station was reached, and that occupied more than twenty minutes. The moment the train came to a stop, I thus addressed the woman, keeping her covered with the muzzle of my pistol: "Leave the carriage; and, if you value your liberty, make what speed you can to get into hiding."

She disappeared instanter, and I felt a heavy load of anxiety lifted off my mind as she left us, for, of all the encounters I most hate, an encounter with a woman is to be chased foremost. From the moment I saw the change in her face indicative of such intense fear, I knew I was master of the situation; but still I was glad to be rid of all further risk of a struggle. Not a word passed between my prisoner and me during the remainder of the journey to London, which we were no great while in reaching, and where I duly delivered him into safe keeping at Bow street police office.

Next morning I had to conduct my prisoner to Woolwich, there to deliver him to the authorities of the hulks, from whom he had obtained his ticket-of-leave. He seemed to have recovered from his scare of the day before, and on our journey spoke freely enough, and with an earnestness that left no doubt of the truth of his communication.

"Master," said he, "I am main glad you kept your head yesterday, and did not lean out of the winder. Had you done so, missus and I meant to have pitched you out, and taken our chances after of getting off."

"I was not very likely to be so easily put off my guard," was my laconic answer.

"Ay, but master, your danger was not over then; for missus and I had made it up that she was to pin your arms—and she could a done it easy—while I was to smash your head with the "darbies." We should then a took the key, got off the bracelets, and heaved you out a winder, afore you could come to yourself. That pistol fairly put us out, for it cowed missus, and she isn't easily cowed, I tell ye."

"But the pistol was not loaded," said I—"nothing but a cap and an empty barrel."

"All the same, master, I'm main glad we failed. Now I've thought it over, I know I could not have escaped. It was known I left in your charge, and that missus joined us. When your body was found, we'd a been spotted at once, and most likely both on us would a swung for it. I'm main glad, I tell you, that you got out o' the mess, and I don't bear you no ill-will for having done your dooty as a man and a hofficer."

Never before, to my knowledge, had I been in such deadly peril, and truly thankful did I inwardly feel for the providential escape I learned I had just made. I was glad to hand my murderous-minded charge over to the care of the officers of the Defense; and I am thankful to add that I never heard more of him.

A Literary Character.

When Simlkins was invited to attend a literary party, a few nights ago, he began studying the prominent quotations and familiar sayings in order to make a good impression on several ladies whom he expected to be present, as well as the general company. He had his route all laid out, as the showmen say, and knew just where he was going to put in the phrases, which he had jotted down in a note book, in case his memory should fail. He was late on purpose, and as his host welcomed him he said:

"As Shakspeare remarks, it's better late than—than—not to get around at all, you know," and then he dropped down with a very red face in the corner and took a peep at his book to see what it was he intended to say.

He was soon seated beside a fair lady, who began conversation by remarking that "The present age of poetry seems to appeal to the sentiments less than the passions, and the future, we should hope, would bring a more æsthetic taste."

"Yes, yes," said Simpkins. "Undoubtedly the future will; for you know the—the saying is, Never too late to—to—darn stockings—no! no!—never too late to put in a stitch in time saves nine. No, that isn't what I mean to say, either; it's never too late to fix anything you see."

Then Simpkins crawled behind the stove and read all his phrases over again. When he emerged and joined a circle at a table he was caught between two young ladies, each of whom came in for a share of his attention, until he said, "How happy could I be with either, if t'other dear charmer was—was—if she'd go home."

And then Simlkins broke for the door as a horrified expression came over the young ladies' faces, and grasping his hat he rushed from the house and down the street, murmuring: "How sharper than a toothless child it is to have a—a—" and then he fainted dead away.—Oil City Derrick.

Another Washington Monument.

Probably one of the oldest societies in the country is that of the Cincinnati. It was formed shortly after the Revolutionary war, and Gen. George Washington was its first President. On his death the members of the society resolved to honor their illustrious chief by a suitable monument, and in the year 1810 a subscription for that purpose was started in the Pennsylvania branch of the general society. Though thus early planned, the project has not yet been realized, but it is expected, however, that work will shortly be begun. Several well-known artists, both in this country and Europe, are preparing designs for the proposed monument, and Mr. Thomas Ball, the sculptor, now in Rome, has sent to the trustees of the society in this city photographs of his design, which are expected to arrive in a few days. The funds are safely deposited, and the amount now in the possession of the State society aggregates nearly $130,000. The site of the monument will be in this city, probably in Fairmount Park.—Philadelphia Ledger.

SENATOR BELL, of New Hampshire, graduated from Dartmouth.

A QUEER JERSEY COLONY.

Eighty Years of Miscegenation and Its Results.

[From the Philadelphia Record.]

A colony of intermarried blacks and whites is located about eight miles from Millville, in New Jersey. The place is known as Gouldtown, and was settled about eighty years ago by John Gould, after whom the town was named. Now it numbers about 500 inhabitants. These are scattered, however, and the land occupied by them covers within an area of about six miles. The town is so near Bridgeton, which is a few miles further south, that nearly all the dealings of the place occur there. On this account there is scarcely a sign of life about the place, and were it not for a toll-gate and its charges the passing ranger would hardly know that the place was inhabited.

The dwellings are all frame, some aspiring to architectural style, while the majority are but a slight improvement upon the railroad tool-house. Two painted signs are visible, one announcing the location of the postoffice and the other designating the school-house; but these are so nearly effaced by the wear of time as to be in keeping with the lifeless aspect of the village. The church is the most artistic building in the place, and its pastor is the ruler of he town.

The women of Gouldtown are white and their husbands are negroes. Men or women who are not willing to comply with these conditions of marriage cannot live in the village with ease or comfort, for the Gouldtowners will have no one about but those in sympathy with their notions. This was the request of its founder when he passed away. And this request their descendants are determined to carry out. Gould's intention in founding the place was to develop his theory of the equality of the negro in his right to marry into the white race.

Gould was a colored man, and, before founding Gouldtown, was in love with a young white girl. This is supposed to have induced the remarkable theory which he evolved. Gould, at the time of this love affair, was residing in Camden, where he married the girl and where he started to inaugurate his theory of equality. He soon found other negroes who had similar designs upon females of the white color, and, when they were consummated, Gould and a few others, friendless, started to dig a livelihood out of South Jersey land. The place they selected was indeed a Jersey Sanara. Whether they paid for the land is not known.

From time to time the settlement increased by the addition of negroes who had taken unto themselves white women as wives. The offspring of these people were, of course, mulattoes, some of whom remained at Gouldtown and intermarried, and others sought matches elsewhere; so that in the fruition of time white men joined in wedlock with mulattoes and mulattoes joined with white women. This state of affairs passed on until to-day the colony presents a mixed condition of society.

The young people of the town are very light in color, but there is no difficulty in distinguishing the negro blood in the features of lightest. The men are mostly strong, healthy-looking, and the girls handsome. Their hair grows long and thickly, and is worn after the old style of making a top-knot on the back of the head. They are tidy and simple in their dress, are polite and attentive in manner, and particularly courteous to the stranger who may pass through their lonely settlement.

On Sunday afternoon every member of the village, big and little, unless prevented by sickness, must attend church. The forms of religion are as simple as their habits. They subsist by tilling their soil, and manage to grow enough to support them comfortably with very little left for exchange purposes.

Among the peculiarities of these people is their fondness for long and distinguished names, such as George Washington Jackson Buchanan. The father of a large family boasts of the name of Daniel Webster Clay, and recently attached Charles Sumner to it. The attachment was accomplished in a novel way. The fathers in the town were called together by means of little posters pasted on the fences, and the man whose name ended with Clay announced officially that henceforth he would be known as D. W. C. Charles Sumner. After this announcement they were all permitted to drink a glass of water from a silver cup, handed down from the time of John Gould, and this legalized the change.

Early Rising.

The ancient maxim of "early to bed and early to rise" has lately received what may be a death blow from a German doctor who, not content to accept the wisdom of nations, has been collecting data on the habits of persons who have attained a great age. He has found that in the majority of cases those who lived the longest were those who went to bed the latest. The London World says:

"Out of every ten persons who had attained the age of 80 and upwards he found at least eight who were in the habit of not going to bed until the small hours, and who consequently were late risers. The doctor is of opinion that early rising tends rather to diminish than to increase vital energy, and to shorten life. He maintains that it is quite a mistake to think that the morning hours are the most strengthening; on the contrary, they are more apt to produce fatigue; and the morning breeze is more dangerous to some constitutions than the damp of the evening."

The Dimensions of Heaven.

The Rev. J. C. Beltzly, Lutheran, is out with a calculation of the size of heaven, based on the statement in the Revelation that the angels "measured with the reed 12,000 furlongs. The length, the breadth, and the height of it are equal." Taking eight furlongs to equal a mile, he comes to the following conclusions: "The heavenly city will be 1,500 miles in each of its dimensions, which will accommodate all the people of all the worlds with separate apartments. There will be precisely 39,541,166,666,666,663,666⅔ rooms of fair size, and there will remain over 240,000,000,000,000,000 of mansions unoccupied, to be occupied by the angels."

Railroad Construction in 1878.

We are very late in presenting our annual detailed statement of the mileage of new road on which track was laid during the past year; but, as the substance of it was presented in tabular form in our first number for the year, there was less need for early publication of the statement, and greater completeness and accuracy were to be hoped for by some delay.

The changes which we have found it necessary to make from that tabular statement are considerable in number and not trifling in amount, especially when we consider that too large a mileage was reported than for several roads. In many cases it is extremely difficult to get accurate information, and the inaccurate statements that are made by parties that ought to be well informed are quite disheartening. We can not hope that the statement published to-day is entirely correct and complete, but great pains have been taken to make it so, official information having been sought in every case of doubt.

The result of this corrected statement gives a total of 2,856 miles of new railroad in the United States on which track was laid in 1878, instead of the 2,688 miles reported January 3. Our new information also compels us to add twenty miles to the mileage reported for 1877, and the totals for the past seven years compare as follows:

Year.	Miles.	Year.	Miles.
1872	7,340	1876	2,450
1873	3,878	1877	2,301
1874	2,098	1878	2,856
1875	1,561

The new mileage, therefore, was in 1878 24 per cent. more than in 1877, 16⅔ per cent. more than in 1876, 83 per cent. more than in 1875, and 31 per cent more than in 1874, yet not 40 per cent. of what was built in 1872.—Railroad Gazette.

Curious Story.

Cincinnati has had a queer case of matrimonial engagement and disengagement, with some very novel accompaniments. According to newspaper reports, John Gibson, proprietor of the Gibson House, wooed and won a young—not very young—woman named Bunce. At least she consented with alacrity to be his wife, and he was on the point of forming a connubial partnership with her when his parents interposed objections to the match. He yielded to them, and withdrew from the proposed alliance, notwithstanding he admitted his own views of, and feeling toward, her to be unchanged. This caused no little surprise among his acquaintances, because he is not, as might be surmised, in the first bloom of youth or under the ordinary restraint of leading strings. On the contrary, he is past 45, a big, burly, ruddy-complexioned fellow, whom no one judging from his experience would suspect of being a calf. But it is supposed that, though nominally in business, he has no money of his own, his father having all the property, and that he is, therefore, very submissive to the will of the governor. However this may be, the junior Gibson refused to keep his part of the agreement; but Miss Bunce held him to it, and he secured release only by paying her $50,000, in five notes of hand for $10,000 each. After this he renewed his courtship, and persuaded her to surrender the notes, which she, in the innocence and affection of her heart, did without hesitation. Then he deserted her, and she has brought suit for damages, sustaining her case by reciting this story, which is very strange, if true.

A Drunken Man's Horrible Death.

Mr. Cichis, of Lensburg, Le Sueur county, got on a spree last week Monday at Montgomery, and wanted to wager that he could swallow the glass contained in a whisky flask. The wager was taken up by one of the party present, whereupon the drunken man proceeded to swallow the pulverized glass, and also a tallow candle. Strange to relate, that night he felt no ill effects caused by the rash deed, but the next day the glass began to cut and grind the bowels, compelling the man to writhe and scream in agony. This continued until Thursday morning, when the poor wretch was brought to New Prague in the delusive hope that a physician could save him from his inevitable and fast-approaching death. Of course no physician's skill could now save or even prolong the life which had been so deliberately, though unknowingly, taken. It was pitiful and heartrending to hear the poor mortal moan and scream in agony as the death-dealing glass slowly but surely cut its way into the vitals. This could not long continue, however, and death kindly relieved the suffering man Thursday afternoon. A post-mortem examination was held, and the man's stomach and intestines were found to be literally ground to pieces. A wife and nine children are left dependent by the foolhardiness of a man crazed by drink.—Shakopee (Minn.) Argus.

Massacres in the South Pacific.

American vessels navigating the South Pacific would be wise to give Brooker island, one of the Calvados group, a wide berth. A Mr. R. P. Ingham undertook to visit Brooker island for the purpose of reclaiming some property that had been seized and appropriated by the savages. His steamer was well equipped. He had a good crew, and in addition two Chinese and three Kanakas. Two guns were mounted on the steamer, one of which was a 90-pounder. The natives received the party with great apparent kindness, killed two pigs in their honor, invited them ashore, and three days after massacred the whole of them. The steamer was plundered and dismantled. It is now reported that six parties of shipwrecked seamen and beche-le-mer parties have been murdered within a recent period among the islands of this group.

THE COMICAL CROW

BY GEORGE COOPER.

"Caw! caw!" sang a crow on the edge of a wood;
"The corn that you gave us is wonderful good;
But why don't you lay it there all in a heap?
You scatter it round and you plant it so deep;
Good farmer, it's tiresome to find it, you know,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have stretched, in a zig-zaggy way,
A string round your acres. I see it to-day.
'They'll think it's a snare,' said you, chuckling outright.
Your cord is no use, sir, as I'm not a kite.
Sweet farmer, I'd have you [illegible] to sow,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have set little boys on the fence:
They shout and amuse us—our joy is intense.
You give yourself plenty of trouble for us.
We're only plain folks. Prithee, don't make a fuss!
Kind farmer, we're not use[illegible] much of a show,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have put an old coat on some sticks;
You want to delight us with all sorts of tricks.
Unmerited kindness we tenderly feel;
But why don't you leave till we finish our meal?
Dear farmer, you're not in a hurry to go,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have brought out a neat little gun.
You're going to shoot at the sparrows, for fun.
Oh, fie! we shan't wait till you've loaded it up,
But hie us away to the next field and sup.
Bad farmer, sad farmer, your end will be woe,"
Said this comical crow.

A Tiny Baby.

[Fairfield (Iowa) Ledger.]

Fairfield's greatest curiosity just now is the little daughter of Dr. and Mrs. J. S. Lowell—heretofore mentioned in the Leader—and a veritable mite of a child she is. The day of her birth she weighed about two and a half pounds, and now, although she is more than 10 weeks old, weighs scarcely three pounds. Our reporter had no idea what a three-pound baby would look like, so he gave the little stranger a call to see for himself and tell his readers. In height, or rather in length, the little girl measures nearly 16 inches, is not at all fleshy, is well formed, and, indeed, rather a pretty child, and shows the ordinary intelligence of a babe of her age. We are not possessed of an uncommonly large hand, but a ring that fits our smallest finger was passed over the child's hand and arm to the elbow. Its wrist is about double the size of a lead pencil, and we believe we have seen rye straws which were as large as its fingers. Its foot is not as large as our thumb and its limbs below the knee, about its diameter. It has a heavy head of hair, eats heartily, can cry lustily, is healthy, and although it has grown but little since birth, gives signs of an unusual amount of vitality. It is indeed a curiosity, and over 400 people have called on the little one, and this ought to set at rest any doubt as to her popularity, for we believe no person in Fairfield was ever honored with so many callers in so short a time—certainly never one so young. The parents, well known in this city, the father being a practicing homeopathic physician, are of medium size, and robust, healthy people, as are their other two children. They feel an unusual love for this tiny little babe, and bestow upon it the tenderest care, and hope that some day it will rival in size those who have been larger in babyhood.

"Savage" Languages.

No human beings are without language, and we know what that implies. All the stories of tribes without language, or with languages more like the twittering of birds than the articulate sounds of human being, belong to the chapter of ethnological fables. What is more important still is that many of the so called savage languages have been shown to possess a most perfect, in many cases too perfect, that is to say, too artificial grammar, while their dictionary presents a wealth of names which any poet might envy. True, this wealth of grammatical forms and this superabundance of names for special objects are, from one point of view, signs of logical weakness and of a want of powerful generalization. Languages which have cases to express nearness to an object, movement alongside an object, approach toward an object, entrance into an object, but which have no purely objective case, no accusative, may be called rich, no doubt, but their richness is truly poverty. The same applies to their dictionary. It may contain names of every kind of animal; again for the same animal when it is young or old, male or female; it may have different words for the foot of a man, a horse, a lion, a hare; but it probably is without a name for animal in general, or even for such concepts as member or body. There is here, as elsewhere, loss and gain on both sides. But however imperfect a language may be in one point or other, every language, even that of Papuas and Veddas is such a masterpiece of abstract thought that it would baffle the ingenuity of many philosophers to produce anything like it. In several cases the grammar of so-called dialects bears evidence to a far higher state of mental culture possessed by these people in former times. And it must not be for-

Arabs that every language has capaci- skin glow they are es ache, but, and sights you pattern and the web of the silk that veils your eyes, and the glare of the outer light. Time labors on —your skin glows and your shoulders ache, your Arabs moan, your camels sigh, and you see the same pattern in the lk and the same glare of light beyond; ut conquering, time marches on, and y-and-by the descending sun has compassed the heaven, and now softly touches your right arm, throws your lank hadow over the sand, right along on the ay for Persia; then again you look pon his face, for his power is all veiled n his beauty, and the redness of flames as become the redness of roses; the fair, wavy cloud that fled in the morning now comes to his sighs once more—comes lushing, yet still comes on—comes urning with blushes, yet hastens, and lings to his side.

Camaron Fishing.

"Camaron" fishing is a pursuit highly thought of in the Island of Mauritius. "Camarons" are a species of cray- or fresh-water prawn which are plentiful in ever river and stream in the olony. They are of a beautiful blue lack, with claws set at the end of feelers quite out of proportion in length to their bodies, and a number of black legs which, when spread out at the bottom f a stream, give them something the ppearance of great spiders. They measure as much as six inches in length nd a large one will turn the scale at a uarter of a pound. When boiled they urn a dark red, and are almost a universal dish as every Mauritian dinnerarty. They are in season during the ummer, when the rivers are low, and he chase aux camarons is made an excuse or many a pleasant party in the woods. adies are indefatigable fishers, and add e charm to the parties by their pleaure. The mode of proceeding is very arious. Arrived at the river side, enerally a pretty English mannered rook, twisting and turning in the usual agrant fashion of brooks between high anks, the party are handed over to an ld piquers, poachers, and guardiens, who have already got ready the fishingackle. This consists of rods and thin amboo six feet long, one end supplied ith a slip noose made from the root of he wild indigo, which is stiff enough to emain open in the water, while it is sufficiently pliant to run together with e least pressure. Provided with one these apiece, the fisherman are taken the water's edge and planted in all rts of queer positions over the likely ols, some astride of trees which have rtially fallen, others on the shelving nk, supporting themselves by sticking eir heels well in the soil here and there herever the water gives promise of marons. The bait is manioc made o a paste and spread at the bottom of e stream. The paste is of the consistcy of thin dough, and a portion of it is rapped in a caladium leaf, lightly ded and dropped dexterously into the ter, when it falls to the bottom, carng the paste with it, which gradually ats out and lies along the gravel. w comes the period of expectancy. e glare of the sun in the water reflects e shadows on its surface like a looking ss, and the eyes, weary of piercing the r water, now ruffled by a puff of nd, filled with tears and see strange ngs as if in a dream, under the ter. Every stone is magnified into a naron, the bits of fallen sticks ckened by lying in the stream assume same shape of the creature's claws, the moving water adds life to the y. At last a camaron makes his apance, crawling lazily, and begins to in the manioc with his claw. The piquer who is looking after you excited, and points and whispers. e most you can see is some black zagging along the bottom, and atch the animal you must push the e gently under his tail till it is over middle, and then with a smart jerk re him. Added to the difficulty of ng him, the camaron is cunning, has a dislike to his tail being ined with, and so plants it firmly on ground and defies you to get the e under it. An impatient movet and he is off with a rapidity quite nishing, and each following attempt him more "touchy." But nce will at length be rewarded, and a final jerk the camaron is pulled struggling violently, and is transferto a pot carried for his reception. he sport goes on; camaron after aron is persuaded to lift his tail, and the penalty in the pot, till the sun oo hot and the camarons refuse to their cool holes under the bank. the chasseurs retire to the "hanfor breakfast, and spend the rest of ay as best they can till the piqueurs o announce that the game is feed ich the party turn out and catch y more as they can before night —Fraser's Magazine.

THE INVISIBLE ASSASSIN.

The club rooms were filled with a crowd of the elite young men of Paris, gathered together, smoking, drinking and telling the latest choice bits of scandal.

It was the hour of exchanging confidential remarks; their gains and losses were freely commented upon, sympathy was given and received.

"I have lost fearfully this last week," said one, as he lit his fragrant Flor de Cabanah; "happily my father is doing well in speculation and he may come down handsomely."

"For my part," said another, "I am slowly picking up. I have held a good hand for three nights running, and when Raoul, there, pays me his little account, I think I can set up a Brougham easily."

As he spoke he pointed towards his debtor, a young man who was leaning back in a small divan, his white hands clasped behind his head, and a pair of glorious dark eyes fixed in a dreamy stare upon a rift in the velvet curtain, where the pale crescent moon hung in the heavens.

"He is thinking," said the first speaker, "about the same old subject, the infidelity of the fair Florette, who has preferred,—and 'tis only natural,—the rich Baron Neglie to the rash young nobleman."

"Ah, my friend," said the handsome Raoul, as he rose from his recumbent position and drew a chair nearer the group; "I am no longer thinking of the faithless Florette, but I am seeking a revenge on that worthless baron who has dared to take her from me."

He laughed softly and rang for a punch, the rest joined in his merriment, thinking it a fine joke that this languid, thoughtless young nobleman, Raoul, should attempt to revenge himself for the loss of a woman, however beautiful she might be, when there were such countless numbers to be had for the asking.

But the smile on the young man's face was not pleasant, as any other but these pleasure reeking young fellows could have seen. The straight mouth and square chin under the dark moustache denoted a character relentless in its decisions, and hard to yield until its purposes were accomplished.

After he had drank his punch he lighted another cigarette and returned to his divan, and while he idly watched the thin blue smoke curling itself into fantastic shapes, he half listened to the conversation going on about him of which snatches from time to time caught his hearing.

Suddenly, had a careful observer been watching the expression of his face, he would have seen a look, horrible in its sinister meaning, pass over his features; the veins swelled in his forehead, his hand clenched convulsively the back of the divan, his breast heaved, while every nerve in his body was strained to hear the half audible voices of the young men he had just quitted.

What was it in their conversation which so excited his attention? They were only speaking of a dark tragedy which had just been placed before the criminal court in London.

A young and lovely girl had been found lying dead in her lover's arms, a knife plunged into her bosom. No one had been seen to enter the house or leave it; the young man was seized, and though there could be no good reason ascribed for the deed, he was arrested and condemned in spite of his protested innocence, and his avowal that he awoke in the morning to find her bathed in her blood.

Many were the comments passed upon it—but ere they had finished speaking, Raoul had passed from the crowded club into the starlight.

Once in the open air he breathed more freely, and gazing about him seemed trying to collect his thoughts.

"I have loved her to madness and I believed she returned my love—but she is untrue! Shall I let him live and enjoy life with her, while I beat out my brains? I—never! I will go to her, I will hear with my own ears their protestations of love! She was faithless to me; she will be so to her husband! Oh! I will be there, but they shall not see me. I will place the crime at his very door, who has dared to rob me of her!"

He laughed bitterly and striking off into one of the many narrow streets leading from the boulevard, he was soon rapidly nearing the house of the unfaithful Florette.

* * * * * *

The next morning all Paris was alive with the news that Florette, the young and lovely actress, had been found by her husband, murdered in her bed.

The concierge swore that no one had entered the house save the young baron, and the servants of Florette affirmed the statement. The baron, half frantic with grief and protesting his innocence, was condemned to prison, where he poisoned himself rather than bear the disgrace which had fallen upon him.

No one could possibly have entered the room without the knowledge of the servants, there was no mark of violence, no theft had been committed; it was clearly the baron who had perpetrated the fearful deed.

And it was not until the terrible tragedy was almost forgotten, that a mad man, confined in one of the hospitals of Paris, revealed in his ravings that he was the assassin, and one of his queer fancies was to imagine himself invisible, and when they pretended to search for him he would laugh loudly, and murmur "they cannot see me!" MILWAUKEE, May 7.

Not More Than One Christian Name.

In looking through so many volumes of county records I have, of course, seen many thousands and tens of thousands of proper names, belonging to men of all ranks and degrees—to noblemen, Justices, jurymen, witnesses, sureties, inn-keepers, hawkers, paupers, vagrants, criminals, and others—and, in no single instance, down to the end of the reign of Anne, have I noticed any person bearing more than one Christian name. The first instance occurs in 1717, when Sir Coplestone Warwick Bampfield appears among the Justices who attended the Midsummer Sessions at Exeter. The first instances which I have met with in any other place are those of Henry Frederick, Earl of Arundel born in 1608, and Sir Henry Frederick Thynne, who was created a Baronet in 1641. Both these must have been named after the eldest son of James I, who was, of course, born in Scotland. No other child of James bore two Christian names, nor did any child of Charles I., except Henrietta Maria, named after her mother, who was a Frenchwoman. No King of England bore two Christian names before William III., who was a Dutchman. It seems probable that the practice of giving children two Christian names was utterly unknown in England before the accession of the Stuarts, that it was very rarely adopted down to the time of the Revolution, and that it never became common until after the Hanoverian family was seated on the throne.—"Quarter Sessions from Queen Elizabeth," *by H. Breath Gymnastics.

The art of breathing is, in the opinion of Chambers' Journal, too much overlooked. Though an act of nature, it can be influenced by the will. Persons, therefore may be trained to breathe properly, that is, to such breathing as will thoroughly oxygenate the blood.

It has been suggested that there is room for what might be fitly termed breath gymnastics—to draw in long and full breaths, filling the lungs full at every inspiration, and to acquire the habit of full breathing at all times.

This habit of full breathing has a direct effect in supplying the largest possible amount of oxygen to the blood, and more thoroughly consuming the carbon, and so producing animal heat. It has also the very important effect of expanding the chest, and so contributing to the vigor of the system.

The breath should be inhaled by the nostrils as well as by the mouth, more especially while out of doors, and in cold weather. This has partly the effect of a respirator in so far as warming the air in its passage to the delicate air cells, and in also rendering one less liable to catch cold.

This full respiration is of so much importance that no proper substitute is to be found for it in shorter though more rapid breathing. In short breathing a large portion of the air cells remain nearly stationary, the upper portion of the lungs only being engaged in receiving and discharging a small portion of air.

Profound thought, intense grief, and other similar mental manifestations, have a depressing effect on respiration. The blood unduly accumulates in the brain, and the circulation in both heart and lungs becomes diminished, unless, indeed, there be feverishness present.

An occasional long breath or deep-drawn sigh is the natural relief in such a case, nature making an effort to provide a remedy.

This hint should be acted on and followed up. Brisk muscular exercise in the open air, even during inclement weather, is an excellent antidote of a physical kind for a "rooted sorrow."

And the earnest student, instead of tying himself to his desk, might imitate a friend of the writer of this, who wrote and studied while on his legs. Pacing his room, portfolio in hand with paper attached, he stopped as occasion required to pen a sentence or a paragraph.

Breathing is the first and last act of man, and is of the most vital necessity all through life. Persons with full, broad, deep chests naturally breathe freely and slowly, and large nostrils generally accompany large chests.

Such persons rarely take cold, and, when they do, they throw it off easily. The opposite build of chest is more predisposed to lung disease.

The pallid complexion and conspicuous blue veins show that oxygen is wanted, and that every means should be used to obtain it.

Deep breathing also promotes perspiration, by increasing the circulation and the animal warmth. Waste is more rapidly repaired, and the skin is put in requisition to remove the used materials Many forms of disease may be thus prevented, and more vigorous health enjoyed.

The Beard.

The custom of shaving the beard was enforced by Alexander of Macedon, not for the sake of fashion, but for a practical end. He knew that the soldiers of India, when they encountered their foes, had the habit of grasping them by the beard, and so he ordered his soldiers to shave. Afterward shaving was practised in the Macedonian army, and then among the Greek citizens. The Romans imitated the Greeks in the practice, as they did in many other things, and spread it to the different European nations yet barbaric. In the Middle Ages, at the time of the Renaissance, shaving was introduced, and the habit was retained, though classicism gave place to romanticism, and that, in its turn, was replaced by realism. The beard was a source of trouble to Peter the Great, who, simultaneously with the introduction of his great reforms in Russia, tried to induce his people to imitate the shaving nations. This innovation was resisted by his subjects with the utmost persistence, and they preferred to pay a heavy fine rather than suffer disfigurement, as they believed, of the image of God. To the Russians of olden times the beard was a symbol of liberty. In several countries of Western Europe and in the United States the beard was restored to honor only about twenty years ago, but even yet the majority of men respect the custom introduced by Alexander the Great.

Noah's Mule.

[Philadelphia Record.]

Noah was a good old man, and the tribulations he experienced when he started out with his "grandest aggregation of the world's wild beasts and floating menagerie" could not be told in a week. Not that the crew of the Ark were not attentive to their duty, and cheered the old man by spinning yarns on the spar deck and dancing hornpipes, but the season was bad, and the animals, somehow, could not settle down and become a happy family, as they do in all well-regulated modern menageries. No act in the old man's life shines out so luminously as his consideration for the mule. There was no long eared native of the towpath aboard the Ark, and it was on this account that he ever held in cherished remembrance that hybrid cross of ass and horse. He recognized how desirable it was to have a mule to make the collection complete, even if it were not a trick mule; but he hoped in vain. If one had been aboard some such record as this would have been found in the log:

"Friday, fourth day out—Gray meditative mule broke loose on the second deck, and worked the baby African elephant into jelly with his hind legs. Mule feels much better.

"Thursday, fourth day out—Heavy sea. Ham, Shem, and Japhet parted with everything except knee pants. Bay mule feeling his oats all day. At 4 p. m. gad-fly inspected mule's off leg. Convulsions in rear part of mule. One gad fly missing and 17 feet of skylight gone."

But the mule was not there, and hence it was that the old man always respected the beast. One of the boys drove a self-opinionated, extra long eared specimen down to the gang plank but there he stuck. The boys had never driven a mule before, and were deficient in the language necessary to inspire the beast to move, and it is said that Noah wished within his heart of hearts that one mule driver had been spared to express his turgid feelings. After delaying the Ark for two days, and the mule showing no disposition to lift a leg, all hands were piped aboard and the Ark set sail.

The log of the voyage, which can be found in almost any European collection of antiquities, shows that a raven was sent out in search of dry land. That raven was never heard from until some years since when he tapped upon the latice window of Edgar A. Poe's bed-chamber, and announced himself as old "Nevermore." That raven is still to be seen in any side show, and can be detected by his voice. The general dampness that prevailed gave him a bronchial affection, and he can be spotted, sure pop, by the cross-cut-saw intonation in his remarks.

But the mule. Some time before Noah ran the nozzle of the Ark abutt Mount Ararat, Japhet was reefing the fore-royal, and almost lost his grip when he descried in the distance the self-same opinionated mule, astride the summit of the mountain, gazing afar out upon the stretch of waters, evidently thinking that the day of canal-boats had been numbered and towpaths would be obliterated evermore. With surprising unanimity all the gnats, gad flies, horse-flies and mosquitoes moved in a body to the mule and held a jubilee on his sloping hind quarters. In the log 16 pages are devoted to a graphic description of what followed. It is the opinion of some naturalist that from that time the mule became docile and showed a spirit to have his hind legs fondled by little boys or colored man in search of everlasting rest.

CURIOUS, USEFUL AND SCIENTIFIC.

GLUCOSE FROM STARCH.—Starch for a year in cold saturated solution of common salt is gradually converted into glucose.

AIR-TIGHT CORKS.—Corks are made both air-tight and water-tight if plunged in melted paraffine and kept there about five minutes. Thus prepared they can be easily cut and bored, and may be inserted in or withdrawn from bottles without difficulty.

THE RENO PAINT MINE.—The Scientific American says that paint mine at Reno, Nev., comprises a ledge 42 feet wide and of unknown depth. The material is said to mix well with oil and not to settle on standing. The mineral contains a small quantity of silver and traces of gold.

A NEW GERMAN INDUSTRY (?)—One of the new industries of Germany, reported by Dr. Stutzer to be now in a "flourishing condition," is the manufacture of artificial clover-seed. Fragments of gravel are sifted until particles of a suitable size are obtained, and the substance until it acquires the desired hue. An ordinary pocket microscope is quite sufficient, however, to expose the cheat.

A GREAT ENGINEERING FEAT.—Owing to the immense weight, the iron shoes in which rest two of the spans of the long Lehigh Vally railroad bridge lately sank about an inch, throwing the bridge out of grade. As it was certain that the depression would continue, owing to the fact that the inside masonry of the pier is less solid than the outside, an iron casting twelve feet long, 3 feet 8 inches wide, and 3 inches thick, weighing 7,000 pounds, was successfully placed under the spans in order to elevate them. The spans weigh 180 tons each. Hydraulic jerks were used. The spans were raised, the masonry redressed, the castings placed in position and the spans lowered without the stoppage of a single train. This is the greatest engineering feat that has been attempted and successfully carrid through in this region.

ANALYSIS OF WINE 45 TO 100 YEARS OLD.—Bottles of port wine from 45 to 100 years old have been analyzed by Berthelot with a view of ascertaining the changes which time effects in that liquid. He found that in the 100 year old wine the cane-sugar had entirely disappeared, and that there was very little of it in the 45 year old bottle. About a fourth of the acidity had been lost through etherification. The amount of cream of tartar was much under the normal solubility. There was little or no change in the alcohol; the old wine contained the same proportion of it as the new port. The gases contained in the wine correspond to the normal saturation of it by the gases of the air.

UNSKILLED WORKMEN.—In nearly all railroad shops at the present time it will be found that large numbers of unskilled men—that is, men who have never learned a trade—are employed at comparatively low wages. Many of the machine tools and much of the wood-working machinery are under the charge of such men, and, as the knowledge required to "run" such machines is easily learned, men of that class soon become experts in one kind of work, and if kept at that alone they soon do as much of it as the most skilled mechanic would. Of course, in the management of a large establishment all such men must be under the direction of some one who has a thorough comprehension of the whole business, and who sees clearly what the ultimate end is which should be accomplished. There must be, and are, men who take all the different parts of a locomotive or of a car, and who know just how these should be made and how to put them all together so as to make a complete machine. These men must have a great variety of knowledge and skill, and necessarily are of a much higher grade than the mere machine tenders. Over these are the foremen of different departments, and then the chief or master mechanic, who directs, or should direct, all—Railroad Gazette.

In a dream last week a Middleton, Connecticut man passed through a trial for murder which seemingly lasted three weeks, in which a great many witnesses were examined and eloquent pleas hours long delivered. At last he was convicted and sentenced. While on the scaffold protesting his innocence to the last, the trap was sprung. But the rope broke and he ran away. He was pursued by the people and the police, but he eluded them until nightfall when he ventured to visit home. There he found his wife attacked by a gang of ruffians. He killed one and drove the rest away. Then he awoke and discovered he had been through these terrible ordeals, all this suffering and anguish, and the three weeks' trail, while sleeping only three minutes.

Ingersoll on Laughter.

No day can be so holy but what the laugh of a child will make it holier still. Strike with the hand of fire, oh, weird musician, thy harp strung with Apollo's golden hair. Fill the vast cathedral aisles with symphonies sweet and dim, deft toucher of the organ's keys; blow, bugler, blow, until silver notes do touch and kiss the moonlit waves and charm the lovers wandering 'mid the vine clad hills. But know your sweetest strains are discords all compared with childhood's happy laugh—the laugh that fills the eyes with light and hearts with joy. O, rippling river of laughter, though art the blessed boundary line between the beasts and men, and every wayward wave of thine doth drown some fretful fiend of care. O, laughter, rose lipped daughter of Joy, there are dimples in thy cheeks to catch and glorify all the tears of grief.

WORM SPECIFIC

OR

VERMIFUGE.

SYMPTOMS OF WORMS.

THE countenance is pale and leaden-colored, with occasional flushes, or a circumscribed spot on one or both cheeks; the eyes become dull; the pupils dilate; an azure semicircle runs along the lower eye-lid; the nose is irritated, swells, and sometimes bleeds; a swelling of the upper lip; occasional headache, with humming or throbbing of the ears; an unusual secretion of saliva; slimy or furred tongue; breath very foul, particularly in the morning; appetite variable, sometimes voracious, with a gnawing sensation of the stomach, at others entirely gone; fleeting pains in the stomach; occasional nausea and vomiting; violent pains throughout the abdomen; bowels irregular, at times costive; stools slimy, not unfrequently tinged with blood; belly swollen and hard; urine turbid; respiration occasionally difficult, and accompanied by hiccough; cough sometimes dry and convulsive; uneasy and disturbed sleep, with grinding of the teeth; temper variable, but generally irritable, &c.

Whenever the above symptoms are found to exist,

Railroad Construction in 1878.

We are very late in presenting our annual detailed statement of the mileage of new road on which track was laid during the past year; but, as the substance of it was presented in tabular form in our first number for the year, there was less need for early publication of the statement, and greater completeness and accuracy were to be hoped for by some delay.

The changes which we have found it necessary to make from that tabular statement are considerable in number and not trifling in amount, especially when we consider that too large a mileage was reported then for several roads. In many cases it is extremely difficult to get accurate information, and the inaccurate statements that are made by parties that ought to be well informed are quite disheartening. We can not hope that the statement published to-day is entirely correct and complete, but great pains have been taken to make it so, official information having been sought in every case of doubt.

The result of this corrected statement gives a total of 2,856 miles of new railroad in the United States on which track was laid in 1878, instead of the 2,688 miles reported January 3. Our new information also compels us to add twenty miles to the mileage reported for 1877, and the totals for the past seven years compare as follows:

Year.	Miles.	Year.	Miles.
1872	7,340	1876	2,450
1873	3,873	1877	2,301
1874	2,025	1878	2,856
1875	1,561

The new mileage, therefore, was in 1878 24 per cent. more than in 1877, 16½ per cent. more than in 1876, 83 per cent. more than in 1875, and 31 per cent more than in 1874, yet not 40 per cent. of what was built in 1872.—Railroad Gazette.

Curious Story.

Cincinnati has had a queer case of matrimonial engagement and disengagement, with some very novel accompaniments. According to newspaper reports, John Gibson, proprietor of the Gibson House, wooed and won a young—not very young—woman named Bunce. At least she consented with alacrity to be his wife, and he was on the point of forming a connubial partnership with her when his parents interposed objections to the match. He yielded to them, and withdrew from the proposed alliance, notwithstanding he admitted his own views of, and feeling toward, her to be unchanged. This caused no little surprise among his acquaintances, because he is not, as might be surmised, in the first bloom of youth or under the ordinary restraint of leading strings. On the contrary, he is past 45, a big, burly, ruddy-complexioned fellow, whom no one judging from his experience would suspect of being a calf. But it is supposed that, though nominally in business, he has no money of his own, his father having all the property, and that he is, therefore, very submissive to the will of the governor. However this may be, the junior Gibson refused to keep his part of the agreement; but Miss Bunce held him to it, and he secured release only by paying her $50,000, in five notes of hand for $10,000 each. After this he renewed his courtship, and persuaded her to surrender the notes, which she, in the innocence and affection of her heart, did without hesitation. Then he deserted her, and she has brought suit for damages, sustaining her case by reciting this story, which is very strange, if true.

A Drunken Man's Horrible Death.

Mr. Cichia, of Lensburg, Le Sueur county, got on a spree last week Monday at Montgomery, and wanted to wager that he could swallow the glass contained in a whisky flask. The wager was taken up by one of the party present, whereupon the drunken man proceeded to swallow the pulverized glass, and also a tallow candle. Strange to relate, that night he felt no ill effects caused by the rash deed, but the next day the glass began to cut and grind the bowels, compelling the man to writhe and scream in agony. This continued until Thursday morning, when the poor wretch was brought to New Prague in the delusive hope that a physician could save him from his inevitable and fast-approaching death. Of course no physician's skill could now save or even prolong the life which had been so deliberately, though unknowingly, taken. It was pitiful and heartrending to hear the poor mortal moan and scream in agony as the death-dealing glass slowly but surely cut its way into the vitals. This could not long continue, however, and death kindly relieved the suffering man Thursday afternoon. A post-mortem examination was held, and the man's stomach and intestines were found to be literally ground to pieces. A wife and nine children are left dependent by the foolhardiness of a man crazed by drink.—Shakopee (Minn.) Argus.

Massacres in the South Pacific.

American vessels navigating the South Pacific would be wise to give Brooker island, one of the Calvados group, a wide berth. A Mr. R. P. Ingham undertook to visit Brooker island for the purpose of reclaiming some property that had been seized and appropriated by the savages. His steamer was well equipped. He had a good crew, and in addition two Chinese and three Kanakas. Two guns were mounted on the steamer, one of which was a 90-pounder. The natives received the party with great apparent kindness, killed two pigs in their honor, invited them ashore, and three days after massacred the whole of them. The steamer was plundered and dismantled. It is now reported [illegible] six parties of [illegible] wrecked seamen [illegible] beche-le-m[illegible] have been

THE COMICAL CROW

BY GEORGE COOPER.

"Caw! caw!" sang a crow on the edge of a wood;
"The corn that you gave us is wonderful good;
But why don't you lay it there all in a heap?
You scatter it round and you plant it so deep,
Good farmer, it's tiresome to find it, you know,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have stretched, in a zig-zaggy way,
A string round your acres. I see it to-day.
'They'll think it's snare,' said you, chuckling outright.
Your cord is no use, sir, as I'm not a kite.
Sweet farmer, I'd have you continue to sow,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have set little boys on the fence:
They shout and amuse us—our joy is intense.
You give yourself plenty of trouble for us.
We're only plain folks. Prithee, don't made a fuss!
Kind farmer, we're not use [illegible] much of a show,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have put an old coat on some sticks;
You want to delight us with all sorts of tricks.
Unmerited kindness we tenderly feel;
But why don't you leave till we finish our meal?
Dear farmer, you're not in a hurry to go,"
Said this comical crow.

"Caw! caw! You have brought out a neat little gun.
You're going to shoot at the sparrows, for fun.
Oh, fie! we shan't wait till you've loaded it up.
But hie us away to the next field and sup.
Bad farmer, sad farmer, your end will be woe,"
Said this comical crow.

The Voice of Summer.

I come, I come! ye have called me long;
I come as the boarder who hears the gong.
Ye may trace my steps by the forest stirred,
By the cry of "Judgment!" and "Out on third!"
By the primrose stars in the shadowy grass,
And Tom-cats assembled in nightly mass.

I have looked on the hills of the stormy north,
And the linen suit has been trotted forth;
The fisher is out on the sunny sea
With his cheese and crackers and rye whiskee,
And the pine has a fringe of softer green,
And bonnets are higher than ever was seen.

Away from the dwellings of careworn men,
Who insist on a rent for their dismal den!
Away from the chamber and silent hearth!
And flee to the garden of beer and mirth!
The branches thrill to the wildwood strains,
And the doctor treateth our aches and pains.

Come forth, oh ye children of gladness, come!
Make yourself numerous as a busted thumb;
Ye of the rose-lip and dew-bright eye,
Come forth to meet me, oh my! oh my!

A Tiny Baby.

[Fairfield (Iowa) Ledger.]

Fairfield's greatest curiosity just now is the little daughter of Dr. and Mrs. J. S. Lowell—heretofore mentioned in the Leader—and a veritable mite of a child she is. The day of her birth she weighed about two and a half pounds, and now, although she is more than 10 weeks old, weighs scarcely three pounds. Our reporter had no idea what a three-pound baby would look like, so he gave the little stranger a call to see for himself and tell his readers. In height, or rather in length, the little girl measures nearly 16 inches, is not at all fleshy, is well formed, and, indeed, rather a pretty child, and shows the ordinary intelligence of a babe of her age. We are not possessed of an uncommonly large hand, but a ring that fits our smallest finger was passed over the child's hand and arm to the elbow. Its wrist is about double the size of a lead pencil, and we believe we have seen rye straws which were as large as its fingers. Its foot is not as large as our thumb and its limbs below the knee, about its diameter. It has a heavy head of hair, eats heartily, can cry lustily, is healthy, and although it has grown but little since birth, gives signs of an unusual amount of vitality. It is indeed a curiosity, and over 400 people have called on the little one, and this ought to set at rest any doubt as to her popularity, for we believe no person in Fairfield was ever honored with so many callers in so short a time—certainly never one so young. The parents, well known in this city, the father being a practicing homeopathic physician, are of medium size, and robust, healthy people, as are their other two children. They feel an unusual love for this tiny little babe, and bestow upon it the tenderest care, and hope that some day it will rival in size those who have been larger in babyhood.

"Savage" Languages.

No human beings are without language, and we know what that implies. All the stories of tribes without language, or with languages more like the twittering of birds than the articulate sounds of human being, belong to the chapter of ethnological fables. What is more important still is that many of the so called savage languages have been shown to possess a most perfect, in many cases too perfect, that is to say, too artificial grammar, while their dictionary presents a wealth of names which any poet might envy. True, this wealth of grammatical forms and this superabundance of names for special objects are, from one point of view, signs of logical weakness and of a want of powerful generalization. Languages which have cases to express nearness to an object, movement alongside an object, approach toward an object, entrance into an object, but which have no purely objective case, no accusative, may be called rich, no doubt, but their richness is truly poverty. The same applies to their dictionary. It may contain names of every kind of animal; again for the same animal when it is young or old, male or female; it may have different words for the foot of a man, a horse, a lion, a hare; but it probably is without a name for animal in general, or even for such concepts as member or body. There is here, as elsewhere, loss and gain on both sides. But however imperfect a language may be in one point or other, every language, even that of Papuas and Veddas is such a masterpiece of abstract thought that it would baffle the ingenuity of many philosophers to produce anything like it. In several cases the grammar of so-called dialects bears evidence to a far higher state of mental culture, possessed by these people in former times. And it must not be forgotten that every language has capacities, if they are only called out, and that no language has yet been found into which it was not possible to translate the Lord's prayer.

Our Duty.

The following sensible and opportune remarks emanate from the pen of a writer on the Courier-Journal, and we endorse them to every democrat in the land:

"The democrats in congress should not allow themselves to be diverted out of the plain line of their duty by the devilish and the mean arts resorted to by the republicans to incense and mislead them.

The democratic party has planted itself upon the constitution. It is the sole remaining bulwark between the constitution and the radical Nihilists. If it falls into the trap set to catch it all of us are over the dam.

So far we can go and no farther. It is for us to propose legislation to the president, for him to dispose of that legislation, and for us again to dispose of him and it, if we have the power. Failing in this latter, we have but one recourse—an appeal to the country.

The veto power is as conclusive as the legislating power. We can not constitutionally coerce it. We can only, by a two-thirds vote, set it aside. That two thirds vote we lack. The republicans are perfectly right in saying that a refusal to veto the appropriations is revolutionary. It is more. It is revolution. It is more. It is ruin.

It is not to be thought of. Nobody is committed to it. Words spoken in debate, in heat, are to be considered as trifles. Legislation is a progressive art. We debate and debate, and we get light as we turn matters over from side to side. We are responsible for the legislation of the country. It is our duty, our interest to make it good and wise. If the president vetoes it, and we can not overrule his veto, the fault is his, not ours, and we can go to the people, seeking a change of administration, with just that advantage.

No extremes on our part, gentlemen. The people, here in Kentucky, are a unit as to that. So all over the south. Pass all that you ought to pass. Send your work to the White House. Let the poor creature who disgraces it further stigmatize himself and his party; and then, having done your business, let us appeal from Chandler and Logan, Edmunds and Hayes, to the whole people, and learn, finally, whether the triple alliance between the ignoramus, the drunkard and the imbecile with the devil for his attorney, is to prevail over an intelligent and honest conservative majority which has made so many sacrifices for the country's prosperity and peace.

The Sunday Law of the States.

[Chicago Inter-Ocean.]

Every state in the Union, with the single exception of Louisiana, has on its statute-books a Sunday law of some kind, and they are all more or less fashioned after the English state of Charles II., passed in the year 1676, and familiarly known as the Lord's Day act. In general terms it may be said that they prohibit labor "on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday" (excepting works of necessity or charity), the transaction of ordinary mercantile business (except the selling of medicines), the keeping open of dram-shops and traveling in vehicles for business or pleasure, with the exceptions in favor of ferrymen and mail-carriers. In some of the southern and western states there are special provisions against the besetting sins of the region. Arkansas punishes Sunday indulgence in "brag, bluff, poker, seven-up, three-up, twenty one, thirteen cards, the odd trick, forty-five, whist, or any other game of cards," by fine of from $25 to $50. California charges from $50 to $500 in the shape of a fine, for attending any "bull, bear, cock or prize fight, horse-race or circus," or for keeping open any gambling house, "or any place of barbarous or noisy amusement, or theater where liquors are sold." Florida, for disturbing any congregation of white persons, provides a fine not to exceed $100, or that the offender shall be "whipped" not exceeding 39 stripes, or imprisoned not exceeding six months." South Carolina alone of all the states, true to her puritanical traditions, sticks to the old notion of compelling attendance upon divine worship. Her statute still provides that all persons "having no reasonable or lawful excuse, on every Lord's day shall resort to some meeting or assembly of religious worship, tolerated and allowed by the laws of the state, and shall there abide, orderly and soberly, during the time of prayer and preaching, on pain of forfeiture, for every neglect of the same, of the sum of $1." The Illinois Sunday law is much milder than the laws of most of the other states. It only prohibits the keeping open of tippling houses, and disturbing the peace or good order of society by unnecessary labor, or amusement or diversion, with exceptions in favor of watermen and railroad companies.

Bulldozing His Employer.

[Exeter (N. H.) News-Letter.]

New Hampshire voters are, it seems proverbially independent in their action. A good story has been told, never before in print, of an old-fashioned New Hampshire democrat who once went down to work for the rich John D. Williams, of Roxbury, Mass. When voting day came round, Mr. Williams asked his hired man how he was going to vote? He replied, for the opposition candidate. Mr Williams said: "If you do so vote I will not have you to work for me a day longer." The hired man then said: "If you don't vote for my candidate I will never work for you a day longer." They confronted each other at the polls, wathced each other, and saw that they voted opposite tickets. The hired man went home, packed up and asked for an immediate settlement. Mr. Williams laughed and said: "I did not mean what I said; I can't get along without you; you won't go?" Hired man said: "I did mean what I said. I will never work for a man who don't vote the democratic ticket." And he went home to New Hampshire. The is a true account of the way an old-fashioned New Hampshire democrat attempted to bulldoze his employer.

An Old Fashioned Reaper.

[Western Farmer's Almanac.]

One day just before harvest an Ohio farmer went to Cincinnati to buy a reaper. A delighted agent collared the granger and dragged him into his warehouse. As they walked down the well stocked room the farmer, in a meditative mood, quoted the line, "There is a reaper whose name is Death," but before he could start the second line the agent broke in; "Ah, yes I know it sir; I know it like a book. We handled that reaper one season, sir, and I'd take $5,000 out of my pocket this minute if it could undo the damage that reaper did our business in that one year. You don't want it, sir. You don't want to look at it. The machinery is complicated; it gets out of order easily; you have to send clear to Akron for a new piece of gearing; it doesn't cut clean, and it nearly kills the horses; jams their shoulders all to pieces, sir. I know that reaper, sir. Its an old, old style, sir, and you don't want it. Now here, sir, I can show you a reaper that ——." But the astonished farmer just interrupted him to say that he knew the reaper he mentioned was an old style, but he was certain it did its work well, though, all the same. It wasn't the kind he wanted, and he had no idea of buying it to work on his farm. He bought another reaper, blood-thirsty as a Cossack, and red as an autumn sunset, and the agent told how nicely he sold a reaper to an old fellow who came in there just dead set for some old machine that he had never heard of before.

Mme. Bonsparte in Defense of America.

In a paper in June Scribner entitled "Mme. Bonaparte's Letter from Europe" occurs the following characteristic passage. The letter from which it is taken is dated Cheltenham, September 23d, 1815, and is addressed to her father:

The Americans begin to excite respect and interest. Their war, so calamitous in existence, has produced beneficial results. My compatriots enjoy a degree of consideration abroad which was long denied them. They are admitted by their proud enemy into the scale of nations. American institutions, government, manners, climate, etc., etc., have become the subject of inquiry and concern. I feel some little complacency in pronouncing myself an individual of a country which every one seems to think will one day be great. I contribute my mite of applause to the valor of its defenders, and the wisdom of its councils. Vive la Patrie! I exaggerate when I descant on its amusements, since whatever may be the great destinies which Baltimore may develop, its pleasures have not yet dawned. Patriotism induces me to draw a veil over the defects of my country; and policy as well as fashion dictate patriotic feelings. The british are, as they modestly confess, the greatest nation in the world. We must acknowledge that their monstrous vanity is excusable when we know that their gold, their armies, and their councils have successfully directed the efforts of combined Europe against the man whose talents menaced their existence. He was the object of their admiration and dread, and they have in him subverted the glory, the existence of France as a nation. They do not in England pretend to revile Napoleon, as some persons in America have done. His stupendous abilities are admitted—his misfortunes almost respected by his enemies. I listen silently to any discussion in which he bears a part. I easily perceive that he has more justice done him here than with us.

Adieu, dear sir, yours affectionately,

E. B.

Permanent Appropriations.

[New York Sun.]

One of the doors through which abuses enter the treasury is known as Permanent Appropriations, for the payment of interest on the public debt, the customs service, and other branches not voted in the regular bills. They undergo no scrutiny by the committee, are drawn from a standing fund, and escape all criticism or examination by congress. In fact they are in the hands of the secretary of the treasury, and are applied largely at his direction. Thus he can increase the number of clerks in the custom house, and other officials not designated by law, without the consent of congress.

This system is necessarily loose and open to criticism, because every dollar of the public money ought to be voted for a specific object, so that it might be traced and the accountability be directly fixed. Not one man in a hundred thousand knows how these permanent appropriations are expended, where the accounts showing the outlay are to be found, or who is responsible for the honesty of the transactions. The practice is one that ought to be cut off. In England the supply bills cover every item of a proposed expenditure, so that if a ship is to be built, parliament knows precisely what it is to cost in detail, from topmast to keelson. If there be excess, the responsible minister has to answer for it in the commons.

Even in the ordinary appropriation bills we are given to the lumping mode, by which tens and perhaps hundreds of thousands are stolen every year, for want of proper and rigid scrutiny. The British method of itemizing strictly, which is simple and easily done by means of a little industry and order, would result in a great saving and be more satisfactory to the taxpayers. In the last congress, the Sundry Civil bill which is a sort of omnibus for everything not included in other bills, and which usually runs up to fifteen or twenty millions, was rushed through the house without even being read! The patriots on both sides swallowed it entire, as an alligator does a cat, and seemed glad to go it blind, leaving impoverished constituencies to pay the piper while they danced.

To illustrate the operation of the permanent system practically, let us take the customs service. There are one hundred and twenty-eight ports recognized by law. Of this number thirty-six, or say one-fourth, do not pay running expenses. Castine, Frenchman's Bay, Machias, Saco, Waldoborough, York, Barnstable, Edgartown, Nantucket, Bristol and Warren, Newport, Stonington, Dunkirk, Sag Harbor, Great Egg Harbor, Little Egg Harbor, Perth Amboy, Alexandria, Petersburg, Tappahannock, Beaufort (N.C.), Pamlico, Albemarle, Georgetown, (S. C.), Natchez, Teche, St. Augustine, St. John's, St. Mark's, Brazos de Santiago, Sandusky, Superior (Minn.), Duluth, Southern District of Oregon, and Alaska together form this class.

The expenses of these offices exceed the receipts by about ninety thousand dollars a year, in round numbers; and they are kept up solely for political considerations. Collectors, deputies, appraisers, clerks, and the like are paid large salaries for doing next to nothing. They are little more than partisan pensioners, who feed at the public crib, vote the regulation ticket, wear a collar round their necks, and shout for a third term of Grantism at the top of their lungs. This is only a single specimen of the prodigality which is scattered all through the public service, and is permitted to exist because members of congress are either unwilling or incompetent to do the duty which they were elected to perform.

THE SULTAN'S GIFT TO GRANT.

Two Arabian Horses of the Purest Blood and Best Form.

[Constantinople Letter to Philadelphia Telegraph.]

In March last, when General Grant, in the course of his cruise in the Vandalia, came to Constantinople, his first visit was paid to the sultan. Immediately after this interview his majesty charged Munir Bey, the master of ceremonies, to present the general with an Arab horse from the imperial stables. Accordingly a number were led out, and one chosen and set aside for him; but, owing to some misunderstanding, the gift horse was not sent, and the Vandalia sailed without him. Recently, the question having been revived, the steed in question was hunted up among the 570 horses which compose the imperial stud. He was found, and, accompanied by a second horse, also for General Grant, transferred to the care of the American legation. Arrangements have been made to send them in a few days on the Norman Monarch, a steamer of 2,000 tons capacity, which will probably sail direct to New Haven. They are to be housed on deck, provided with canvas belts to swing in, in rough weather, and treated like saloon passengers. So it is to be reasonably hoped that the end of their thirty days' passage will find them sound in wind and limb. One is a dappled gray of fair size, and having all the traits characteristic of the Arabian blood—small, well set, restless ears, wide pink nostrils, and large soft eyes, waving mane, and long tail reaching almost to the ground, and a skin of such delicacy that the stroke of a lady's whip is sufficient to draw blood. The other stallion has all these points. He is a glossy black, with a white star on his forehead and white hind feet. When the long forelock falls over his forehead, the large black eyes have all the expression of a Bedouin woman's. Their gait is perfect, be it either the rapid walk, the long swinging trot, or the tireless stretching gallop, while a rein of one thread of silk is enough to guide their delicate mouth. Let one of these Arabs, in the mad rush of a charge or flight, lose his rider, and that instant the docile steed will stop as though turned into stone. These two horses are of the famous Saktan race, the purest Arabian blood, only found in and near Bagdad. The dapple-gray is appropiately named Djeytan (The Panther), and the black Missirli (The One from Cairo), which cognomen he derives from the fact that he was bought at Cairo, although foaled at Bagdad. For breeding purposes as well as for saddle-horses their blood and temper are high recommendations, and I have no doubt that our great general will be highly pleased with the sultan's gift.

Some Jacksonian Sarcasm.

[Boston Transcript.]

Not long after General Jackson's retirement from the presidency a rumor got abroad that he was bankrupt. This was too good a chance of banter for the whigs, whose detestation of Old Hickory followed him to his retreat at the Hermitage, to neglect. A whig firm in Cincinnati, taking ironical pity on the old hero, pasted two cards together, inserted two of the large, old-fashioned copper cents betweed them, and inclosed them to the ex-president full of mock condolence. The postage on the letter was seventy-six cents, which General Jackson, not knowing what was within, promptly paid. He at once sat down and penned a characteristic reply, inclosing the two cents back to his would-be persecutors. This reply they did not see fit to take out of the postoffice, and it found its way to the dead letter office at Washington. The original is now in the possession of George M. Towle, who kindly permits Causeur to insert it here. It is full of Old Hickory's gruff, sarcastic humor, as well as his bad spelling and grammar, as will be seen:

HERMITAGE, May 11, 1837.

"GENTLEMEN: Your kind letter, conveying your charity of two copper cents, which you forwarded on hearing that I was broke, and a bill drew by me for $6,000 had been returned protested, has been received; and, as you have been imposed upon by the vile falsehoods that are daily circulated by the Whiggs, your kind charity is herewith returned to you, that you may dispose of it, in charity, to such of the Whiggs that may have been employed in trading in stocks and land, and in swindling the poor. Have the goodness to inform all your friends that I have not drawn a draft for any sum, on any one, for twenty years, nor have I any use for your kind charity, having long since learned to live within my own means. Your charity is therefore returned to you in the same envelope you sent it, supposing from the material and great care taken it is your only charity repository, and the objects of charity in your city would be much injured if not returned to you. Your mo. obt. servt. till death.

ANDREW JACKSON."

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

A Boston jury has awarded Charles H. Worthen, of Chicago, $28,500 for the loss of a leg on the Grand Trunk railroad in July, 1875.... Disastrous forest fires are reported in the region of Fryburg, Me. Immense quantities of timber and lumber have been burned. ....Henry J. Cross, City Treasurer of Salem, Mass., hanged himself the other day.

A Belvidere (N. J.) dispatch says that ex-State Senator J. B. Cornish, convicted of conspiracy to defraud the county of $10,000, and J. H. Sweeney, ex-Chief of Police of Phillipsburg, convicted of raising a county bill, were each sentenced to one year in State prison. ....Philadelphia papers record the death of Judge Asa Packer, President of the Lehigh Valley railroad, and one of the wealthiest and most prominent citizens of Pennsylvania....The bay mare Nettie, with a record of 2:18, died at Philadelphia a few days ago, from blood poison, caused by picking up a nail....The steam yacht Louise capsized in the harbor of New York the other day, and, of a party of seven on board, three found a watery grave.

A committee of the New York Assembly says it will cost $15,000,000 to complete the Brooklyn bridge, and that its safety should be determined by competent engineers....John Flynn, who robbed a lady of a diamond earring, while walking on Fifth avenue, New York, has received a sentence of eighteen years in the penitentiary.

A large number of people gathered at Niagara falls the other day to witness Harmon Peer in the performance of his jump from the new suspension bridge at the falls into the river. In the center of the bridge, from which point he jumped, or rather let go, was a little windlass having a cylinder about six inches in diameter, on which was wound about 230 feet of very light copper wire, fastened to his body in such a manner as to keep his body in an upright position during the descent without in any degree impeding his progress. Considerable excitement was manifested by the large crowds assembled along the tops of the banks on either side of the river as Peer climbed over the railing of the bridge preparatory to descending. But this was greatly intensified when he hung only by his hands to the very bottom timbers of the structure, with nothing between him and the river below, a distance of exactly 195 feet. He suddenly loosed his hold amid cries of "Oh! oh!" from the spectators, quickly placed his hands under his arms, in which position they remained during his perilous trip, which lasted but four seconds. He struck the water with a thud and a splash, distinctly audible on the tops of the banks, and disappeared under the water, remaining out of sight for as much as ten seconds. He was not in the least injured by the perilous leap.

Judge Asa Packard died one of the wealthiest men in America, and his will contains heavy bequests that prove him to have been a sincere friend of education and charity. Lehigh University gets an endowment of $1,500,000, besides $500,000 for a library; $300,000 goes to St. Luke's Hospital, $30,000 to St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Mauch Chunk, besides other bequests not yet made public.

THE WEST.

A murderer named West was hanged at Booneville, Mo., on the 16th inst. When the drop fell the rope broke and the body straightened out and turned over, when he was picked up and another rope retied. Wallace Wilkerson was executed the same day, at Provo, Utah. In that Territory the law permits a choice between hanging and shooting, and Wilkerson elected to die by the bullet. He was shot by three concealed men, and died in twenty-seven minutes.

Advices from the Indian Territory report that a body of United States cavalry is raiding the Territory, turning back everything that looks like a squatting outfit. The discomfited settlers are pouring across the Canadian river pell-mell, evidently for the most part impressed with the belief that the soldiers mean business, and that the Executive will maintain the alleged treaty with the Indians. Some of the unfortunate emigrants are hard up for food. The cavalry, it is stated, will continue patroling the country until the last intruder is driven out.

M. N. Barnes, a postal clerk on the Hannibal & St. Joe road, has been arrested at Quincy for robbing the mails, after a series of successful thefts extending throughout the past eight months....Some of the Western railroads are infested with tramps, and the movement of freight trains has occasionally been interfered with by them....The Chicago trades unions propose to put the eight-hour rule in force on and after the Fourth of July. It is understood that persons interested in the movement are endeavoring to secure the co-operation of labor organizations throughout the country, so that the rule may be simultaneously adopted in all the principal towns and industrial centers.

A terrible deed of blood is reported from California. L. Longbehm, a German, living on a vegetable ranche near Antioch, Contracosta county, took his little boy and girl, aged respectively 6 and 4 years, beat them to death with a club, cut their throats, and then went to the house and blew his own brains out with a shot-gun. The family had always lived happily together, and the act is attributed to temporary insanity.... Lieut. Carrow, of the Seventh U. S. Cavalry, committed suicide at St. Louis, Mo., last week, by shooting himself through the head with a revolver. He was addicted to strong drink.

Chicago elevators contain 5,274,035 bushels of wheat, 2,718,842 bushels of corn, 212,413 bushels of oats, 55,799 bushels of rye, and 211,907 bushels of barley, making a grand total of 8,472,996 bushels, against 1,891,449 bushels at this period last year....Dr. J. H. Rauch, who has recently returned from the South, says that the authorities and citizens of New Orleans are doing all in their power to prevent a recurrence of the yellow-fever epidemic this year....Orlando Cassler was executed at Seward, Neb., May 20, for the murder of George L. Monroe....William Nelson (colored) has been sentenced, at Terre Haute, Ind., to the penitentiary for one year and a fine of $1,000 for marrying a white woman.

Reports from Indian Territory represent that the Choctaws and Chickasaws are arming themselves to resist the threatened raid upon their lands....The Chicago papers chronicle the death of John Jones, the representative colored citizen of the Garden City. He left quite a large fortune.

The Broadway Savings Bank, in St. Louis, has suspended....The menagerie establishment owned by J. M. French, near Detroit, was destroyed by fire last week. The elephant Sultan, five lions, a zebra, leopard, stag, and many other valuable animals were cremated.

THE SOUTH.

The business portion of Farmerville, La., has been destroyed by fire. Loss about $100,000....Two white men and a negro were executed at Hillsboro, N. C., on the 16th inst., for burglary, which is a capital crime in that State. At Plaquemine, La., the same day, Robert Cheney (colored) was hanged for rape. ....The seat of government of Louisiana is to be relocated at Baton Rouge, where it existed for many years prior to the late war.

Col. Tom Buford, the assassin of Judge Elliott, of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, was arraigned for trial, last week, at Frankfort, Ky., the capital of the State. The defense moved for a change of venue, which was promptly granted by the court. Owenton, the county seat of Owen county, was selected as the place of trial, and the second Tuesday in July as the time.

William G. Stone ex-City Treasurer of Newport, Ky., has been convicted of omitting to make correct returns, and sentenced to one year in the penitentiary. A motion was made for a new trial, awaiting which the prisoner was lodged in jail.

POLITICAL.

It seems probable that the Ohio Republicans will nominate ex-Attorney General Alphonso Taft for Governor, and ex-Congressman Charles Foster for Lieutenant Governor. ....The Greenbackers of Boston have arranged for a great mass meeting in that city on June 5. Peter Cooper will preside, and Gen. Butler, Wendell Phillips and Congressman Weaver will do the talking.

The Iowa Democratic State Convention was held at Council Bluffs May 21, 476 delegates being in attendance. Gen. A. C. Dodge presided. H. H. Trimble, of Davis county, was nominated for Governor; J. O. Yeoman, of Webster county, for Lieutenant Governor; R. E. Noble, of Clayton county, for Supreme Judge, and Irwin Baker, of Warren county, for Superintendent of Public Instruction. The resolutions denounce the Republican party and indorse the course of the Democrats in Congress in insisting upon the repeal of the laws authorizing the use of troops at elections; favor the substitution of United States treasury notes for national-bank notes, and of the abolition of national banks as banks of issue, and favor free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains.

Secretary Sherman has written a letter to the Chairman of the Ohio Republican Committee, announcing that he cannot be a candidate for the Governorship. He says he would be proud of the honor, but cannot abandon the financial work he has undertaken.

A State Convention of the Prohibition party of Indiana was held at Indianapolis, May 21. The following ticket was nominated: For Governor, Ryland T. Brown, of Marion county; Lieutenant Governor, the Rev. J. V. R. Miller, of Monroe county; Secretary of State, Abraham Spainhawer, of Greene county; Treasurer, William S. Hubbard, of Marion county; Auditor, Jeremiah Leiter, of Fulton county.

Visible supply of grain in the States and Canada: Wheat, 15,108,000 bushels; corn, 10,627,000 bushels; oats, 1,750,000 bushels; rye, 877,000 bushels; barley, 1,777,000 bushels.

The Gloucester fishing schooner Ida E. Baker has been lost, with her crew of twelve men, on the Atlantic coast.

Burned: The Flaven Printing Company's establishment, St. Louis, Mo., loss $35,000; a large number of dwellings and shops in Clinton, Iowa, loss, $150,000 to $200,000; the flouring mills of H. P. Beattie, at Davenport, Iowa, loss, $100,000.

WASHINGTON.

The Treasury Department will have about $2,000,000 a month available for the payment of arrears of pensions, after the 1st of July. The adjustment of claims will not, therefore, exceed that rate unless Congress at its present session provides some special fund for the purpose.

The House committee on the state of the law respecting the ascertainment and declaration of the result of the election of President and Vice President have agreed upon a bill and authorized Representative Bicknell, Chairman, to report it to the House with the approval of the committee. The bill provides, in effect, that in case of any contest between different sets of electors in any State, the Supreme Court of that State shall decide between them, and the decision shall be final unless it shall be overturned by the concurrent action of both houses of Congress.

The President has appointed Eugene Schuyler, of New York, Consul General at Rome. Consuls—Judson A. Lewis, of Sierra Leone, at that place; Wilson King of Pennsylvania, at Birmingham; William F. Grinnell, of New York, at Bremen; Alexander McLean, of New Jersey, at Guayaquil.

A cable dispatch announces that the Sho-wae-cae-mette Boat Club, of Monroe, Mich., who made so good a record at Henley last year, have been barred from entering in the great English race this year. The reason assigned is that the members of the Sho-wae-cae-mette crew have been mechanics or artisans, and are, therefore, not entitled to rank as "gentlemen amateurs." The real reason for the exclusion, of course, is the certainty that the "Shoes," if admitted to participation, would bring home from Henley some of the most valuable of the prizes.... FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

[EXTRA SESSION.]

A message from the President in reply to a resolution asking for information relative to the unlawful seizure of lands in the Indian Territory was laid before the Senate on the 16th inst. On motion of Mr. Ingalls, it was resolved that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of legal-tender notes have been presented and redeemed in coin since the 1st of January last, and what amount of coin he considers himself authorized to retain in the treasury to maintain specie resumption. The Senate resumed consideration of the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Appropriation bill, and Messrs. Eaton, Conkling and Kernan made speeches upon the proposed political legislation.——The House occupied the day in considering the Warner Silver Coinage bill. A resolution was adopted providing for the appointment of a standing committee, to which shall be referred all bills, resolutions, petitions, etc., affecting the traffic in alcoholic liquors.

The Legislative Appropriation bill occupied the attention of the Senate on the 17th, and there was a long running debate between Messrs. Saulsbury, Windom, Edmunds and Conkling, about the Delaware and Maryland riots, and the use of troops in those States during the war.——The House was engaged all day upon the Warner bill for the free coinage of silver. A proposition limiting the free coinage to American bullion was defeated by a large majority, and an amendment that the Government should receive all the profits of coinage was also rejected, though by a very close vote.

In the Senate, on the 19th, consideration was resumed of the Legislative Appropriation bill, and Mr. Blaine spoke in opposition to the proposed legislation. He was frequently interrupted by Democratic Senators, and the debate at times grew quite animated. A communication was received from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the 16th inst., calling for certain information in regard to the operations of the Treasury Department. The Secretary writes: "There has been redeemed in coin since Jan. 1, 1879, of legal-tender notes, an amount of $4,123,813. As to the amount of coin authorized to be retained in the treasury for the purpose of maintaining the resumption of specie payments, I have to state that under the provisions of the Resumption act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to prepare and provide for the redemption of United States notes, to use any surplus revenue in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue certain bonds of the United States, the coin reserve of the treasury has been increased to $130,000,000, that being about 40 per cent. of the notes outstanding to be redeemed, and believed to be the smallest reserve upon which resumption could be prudently commenced and successfully maintained, as set forth in my last annual report. This reserve arose from the sale of $95,500,000 in bonds and from surplus revenues, as authorized by law, and it must, under the existing law, be maintained unimpaired for the purpose for which it was created."——The House was not in session.

The Senate, after a prolonged and somewhat acrimonious discussion of the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, quietly passed it on the 21st, by a vote of 37 yeas against 27 nays, and then adjourned over until the 23d. The bill, as passed, embraced all the amendments agreed upon by the Democrats in caucus. Mr. McDonald asked leave to introduce a bill authorizing the President of the United States to employ the militia and land and naval forces of the United States to enforce the laws whenever their execution is obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the judicial authorities, etc., and preventing the military from being used as a posse comitatus except in cases as authorized by the constitution and laws. Mr. Edmunds objected to the introduction of the bill, on the ground that previous notice had not been given.——The House was engaged all day upon the Warner Silver Coinage bill.

The House devoted another day to the consideration of the Warner Silver bill, on the 21st, without reaching a final vote on the measure. The Senate was not in session.

In the Senate, on the 23d, Mr. McDonald obtained leave to introduce his bill regulating the use of the army, and Messrs. McDonald, Wallace and Edmunds gave notice of their intention to speak thereon. The bill to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases was discussed at great length, without action.——In the House, there was another warm day's work on the Warner Silver bill. The bill to amend the laws relating to the transfer of cases from State to Federal courts was taken up, but the Republicans refused to vote on the demand for the previous question, thereby blocking business.

A Simple Water Filter.

Those who cannot afford to buy a filter may easily make one. Stuff a piece of sponge in the hole of a flower-pot, place above this a layer of pebbles, then a layer of clean, coarse sand, and above this a layer of pounded charcoal three or four inches in depth. Another layer of pebbles should be placed above the charcoal to prevent it from being stirred up when the water is poured in. The contents of the flower-pot should occasionally be renewed. But, by a small addition to this, a cottage filter may be made which, for practical use, is quite equal to the most expensive filter of corresponding size. It consists of two flower-pots, one above the other, the lower one fitted with a sponge and filtering layers as above described, the upper one with a sponge only. The under pot should be the largest, and, if the lower one is strong, the upper one may stand on it, or a piece of wood with a hole to receive the upper pot may rest on the brim of the lower one. The two pots, thus arranged, are placed on a three-legged stool with a hole in it, through which the projecting part of the lower sponge passes, and the water drops into a jug placed below. The upper pot serves as a reservoir; thus the filtering layers of the lower one may be used for two or three years without being renewed, if the upper sponge be occasionally cleaned. Care must be taken to wedge in the upper sponge tightly enough to prevent the water passing through the upper pot more rapidly than it can filter through the lower one.

A Barrel of Potatoes from One Vine.

A gentleman told us the other day that if a barrel with both heads out were placed over a potato vine, and the earth filled in around the vine from time to time as it grew, it could be filled to the top, and that it would produce potatoes all the way up; that on kicking the barrel over it would have a bushel or more potatoes. Who has tried it? Who will try it?—Colusa (Cal.) Sun.

They are on board a steamer on the way from Constantinople to New Haven.

The Roman correspondent of the Independance Belge remarks that Garibaldi's countenance has quite lost the vivacious expression it used to wear. He cannot stir without assistance, and suffers frequent torments of pain. Garibaldi is now 73. It is twenty-nine years since he was soap and candle-making on Staten island, and, to use Lord Beaconsfield's phrase, "a great deal has happened since then."

Talmage lately referred to the Brooklyn Presbytery in a parable as follows: "A few summers ago I lay down in the woods and fell asleep. When I woke up I found a caterpillar on my foot, an ant crawling up my sleeve and spiders weaving a web across my body—one web across my foot, one across my knee, one across my waist, one across my chin, one across my nose, one across my forehead—just seven specifications."

Tennyson, the poet laureate, is thus pictured in the Independance Belge: "Tall, rather stout, round shouldered, walking with a stick, a long beard completely burying the face, and a pair of round, Chinese-looking spectacles." His attire: "A felt hat, much the worse for wear, the brim large and flabby, drawn low over his forehead; trousers too wide, shabby-looking coat too tight, his left hand in constant contact with his spectacles, which have a large gold rim that flashes in the sun as he advances toward you."

Tigers.

Tigers can lay themselves so flat on the ground, and lie so perfectly motionless, that it is often a very easy thing to overlook them. On one occasion, when the Purneah hunt were out, a tigress that had been shot got under some cover that was trampled down by a line of about twenty elephants. The sportsmen knew that she had been severely wounded, as they could tell by the gouts of blood, but there were no signs of the body. She had disappeared. After a long search, beating the same ground over and over again, an elephant trod on the dead body lying under the trampled canes, and the mahout got down and discovered her lying quite dead. She was a large animal and full grown. On another occasion George was after a fine male tiger. He was followed up fast, but coming to a broad nullah, full of water, he suddenly lost sight of his game. He looked up and down the bank, and on the opposite bank, but could see no traces of the tiger. Looking down he saw in the water what he first took to be a large bull-frog. There was not a ripple on the placid, stagnant surface of the pool. He marveled much, and just then his mahout pointed to the supposed bull-frog, and in an excited whisper implored George to fire. A keen look convinced George that it really was the tiger. It was totally immersed, all but the face, and lying so still that not the faintest motion or ripple was perceptible. He fired and inflicted a terrible wound. The tiger bounded madly forward, and George gave it its quietus through the spine. A nearly similar case occurred to old Mr. C. A tiger bolted toward a small tank or pond, and, though the line followed up in hot pursuit, the brute disappeared. Old C., keener than the others, was loath to give up the pursuit, and presently discoved a yellowish reflection in the clear water. Peering more intently, he could discover the yellowish tawny outline of the cunning animal, totally immersed in the water, save its eyes, ears and nose. He shot the tiger dead, and it sank to the bottom like a stone. So perfectly had it concealed itself that the other sportsmen could not for the life of them imagine what old C. had fired at, till his mahout got down and began to haul the dead animal out of the water.—"Sport and Work on the Nepaul Frontier," by Maori.

Civilizing the African.

The great missions in Central Africa are marvelous for the magnitude of the enterprise of their establishment. Not one of them but required an outlay of $50,000 to settle it. The difficulties of the journey from the coast were without precedent. For hundreds of miles, in the case of the Nyanza mission of the Church Missionary Society, immense stores and a steamboat had to be transported; and there was but one mode of transportation—that by porters. Of course it took an army of carriers, who had to be watched, and fed, and coaxed and bribed, and a considerable part of the journey was through an unknown country. But the steamer is on the lake, the stores are safely housed at their destination and the voice of the missionary is heard in King Mtesa's capital. And this is only a beginning. Reinforcements are to be sent out and a colony formed. There is no more important center in Africa for missionary work than Uganda. The missionaries will have the sweep of the great lake and access to all the tribes over which Mtesa's powerful influence extends. Preparations are being made not only to preach to the people and teach them to read and write, but to instruct them in agriculture, the Scottish mission in the Shire hills have already a farm of fifty acres under cultivation. The teaching of this industry is quite as important as instruction in letters in leading savages to adopt a peaceful and settled mode of life. Another mission is soon to be established by French Protestants among a class of people who speak the Bassuto language on the Zambesi river, about 400 miles west of Nyassa. From the west coast, two societies—the Baptists and the Cardiff Livingstone mission—are preparing to ascend the Congo or Livingstone river above the Livingstone falls, where, by steamer, they can have easy access to a great many people. If, in addition to these seven great enterprises, we consider what has been done south of Lake Ngami and what is being done on the Niger, in Liberia, on the Gaboon river and elsewhere on the continent, we cannot but be impressed by the thought that Christianity will, though many generations may intervene, take possession of Africa.—Independent.

The Master Mule.

This morning a couple of miners were seated on a bowlder alongside the road to Sutro, discussing the kicking powers of the mule. One had just returned from Sutro, and the other was on the way there, and, having met near the rock, they sat down for a talk.

"Have you quit over there?" said the one who was eastward bound.

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Mules."

"Fraid of 'em?"

"You bet. I saw one yesterday alongside an old boiler kickin' off the the rivet-heads one by one. Never missed one. I was just going on the shift, and, when I saw the mule and heard there was more of 'em inside, I weakened and threw up my job. I've got a wife and three children dependin' on me, and I don't take chances."

"The worst mule I ever saw," said the other, "was in Pioche some years ago. It was one I owned. One day it rubbed against some nails sticking out of a post, and it turned square around and drove those nails in one by one, using a single blow of the hoof with the iron shoe on for each nail. It never missed its lick, and always drove 'em just in to the head. Then he saw a few tacks on the post'n little lower down, which were only half driven in, and he drove them in, too, with light taps of the hoof, just as easy and gentle as could be. One day a man came along and set out a can of nitro-glycerine and giant powder. He wanted to get the mule to kick it and get killed. I saw him about the corral with the can, and knew what was up. At first I was going to stop him, but then I thought if my mule was any kind of a mule at all he could take care of himself. So I just watched. Well, the mule saw the can, and walking up smelt of it, and then squared himself for the kick. The man was sneaking off, and, just as the mule was going to kick the can, he caught sight of the feller, and changed his position so that his tail was toward the man. He lifted his tail just like he was takin' aim, and he let fly his right hoof. The can went flying through the air and hit the man square in the rear just as he was gettin' over a fence about a hundred feet away. The thing exploded, and I never saw the man again. But next morning Pat Holland came out in the Record and said that the town had been visited by a shower of blood."

"Mules are immense when they git roused."

"You bet."—Virginia City Chronicle.

A Nevada Judge.

"It is a surprise to see a young man like you here," said Judge Bowker, at Reno, Nev., the other day, to a fellow who had been whooping it over night. "You filled yourself up with an enemy to deprive you of your brains," proceeded the court, rearranging its spectacles and glaring at the culprit. "Now, here you are, a young man of intelligence and good clothes on, and doubtless you have a mother and sisters who think a great deal more of you than I do. You've been sent to school and taught how to earn a good living. In return for this you go screaming around the streets at midnight, tearing down signs and making a wild beast of yourself. Is that like the conduct of a reasonable creature? No, of course it isn't. Now, I'm going to teach you a lesson, young man. You needn't turn pale, for it won't help you any. Have you got any chewing tobacco about you? Thankee. Chew more and drink less, like I do. You're discharged. Next time you're tempted to take a drink, think of my kindness and weep, and refrain from the debasing habit. Eh? Well, I don't care if I do. Avery, come out and join me with this young gentleman."—Exchange.

TRADE NOTES.

The iron works of Altoona, Pa., are again in full blast.

Paterson, N. J., is rapidly filling up with silk weavers from England.

In Newark, N. J., every manufactory working in iron is busier than at any previous period in several years.

Last month 10,000,000 paper bags were made by a factory at Ballston Spa, and yet the supply falls short of the demand.

The brick-making industry is now one of the most important on the banks of the Hudson river. It is estimated that there are upwards of 150 brick-yards between Tarrytown and Albany.

In Pittsburgh, Pa., the iron-manufacturers are complaining of the high rate of wages. At the present rates the puddler gets $3.50 per day, the bar-mill roller from $6 to $8, the catcher from $5 to $6, the heater $4, the sheet-roller from $4 to $5, sheet-heaters from $4 to $4.50, and the shearsmen from $3 to $3.50.

The business outlook in Cleveland, Ohio, is cheering. According to the Leader of that city, the prices, which have for months been depressed, are on the mend, and an upward tendency prevails well nigh universally. Mechanics, too, of all trades, are in demand, and few idle men among that class who honestly desire work can be found. Architects are busier than before for years, and some claim to have all the work they can do.

Centennial Celebrations.

The counties of Sullivan and Orange, New York, and Pike county, Pennsylvania, are making great preparations to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the battle of Minisink, which occurred on the mountain in Sullivan county, one mile east of Lackawaxen, July 22, 1779. On July 20, 1779, Joseph Brandt, the Mohawk chief, made a descent upon the settlement of Minisink, now Port Jervis, N. Y., massacred many of the inhabitants, plundered their property and burned their dwellings. Next day a company of militia, numbering 140 men, was organized at Goshen, N. Y., to wage war upon the Indians, who were 400 strong. In command of Col. Hathorn, the volunteers overtook the savages at Halfway brook, just opposite Lackawaxen, where an attack was made. The battle began between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning, and lasted until sundown. During the terrible conflict forty-four of the volunteers were killed, the remainder making their escape by swimming the Delaware river and fleeing to the Pennsylvania forests. The remains of these men were collected in 1822 and deposited in the burying ground at Goshen, and a large marble monument, bearing the names of the victims, was erected to their memory. The occasion was witnessed by about 20,000 people. The place for celebrating the event has not yet been decided upon, but it is believed it will be held at Goshen; if not, on the battle ground.

—New Hampshire will this year celebrate the second century of her existence as a separate province and State. On the 18th of September, 1679, the union which had existed for thirty-eight years between Massachusetts and New Hampshire was dissolved by the King.

Risking Eternal Torture.

Mrs. Bly, of Memphis, long ago made up her mind that life was undesirable, and was only restrained from suicide by fear of future punishment. She consulted with several clergymen, all of whom told her that the self-murderer, if mentally sound, would surely be made to suffer throughout eternity. The recent discussion of the doctrine of eternal torture, however, convinced her that there was a wide difference of opinion among orthodox ministers, and therefore, after writing out her opinion that the penalty of her sin would be no more than a brief period of suffering, she took a fatal dose of arsenic.

On Easter Monday the usual meeting in favor of "the claimant" took place in Hyde Park, London. On a brougham containing five women was a banner with the words: "O Queen, restore our brother, Sir Roger Tichborne, the victim of perjury and corruption."

AUBURN COURIER.

THEO. REED, ROB. J. LOWRY | Editors.

SENATOR THURMAN.

Synopsis of His Great Speech the Senate.

A Powerful Argument in Favor of Free and Fair Elections.

The Infamies of Johnny Davenport and the Iniquities of the Jury Laws in the South Shown Up.

Mr. Thurman began by saying that they had before them an appropriation bill for the support of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of the Government. Nobody denied that the amount was sufficient, but opposition had been made to the bill because of the provisions relating to trial by jury and to elections. Rather than agree to these, the minority say in effect that they will stop the appropriations and defeat the bill. Scarcely any word had been uttered by the minority on the merits of this question. It was said that these provisions had no proper place in the appropriation bills, and that they were dictated by the South, because the gentlemen, in their imagination, supposed there was a huge conspiracy to produce anarchy, as if the majority here and the Democratic people of the United States have not as much interest in the order, peace and prosperity of the country, and the perpetuity of the Government, as any men belonging to the Republican or any other party.

Mr. Thurman proceeded to analyze the laws proposed to be repealed, and argued that they were in the utmost degree oppressive, as they shut out intelligence from the jury box, and punished those who could not take the iron-clad oath because they had given a cup of cold water, even, to anyone who had opposed the Government. If the law was justifiable in war it was not so now, at a time when all should unite. The most inflammatory, unfounded and unjustifiable attempt had been made to array one portion of the people against the other, thus endeavoring to make sectionalism as permanent as the continent itself. Why did not these gentlemen point out the defects of the provisions if they believe they exist? They were told that these provisions were inserted at the command of Southern domination, but there was not a word of truth in it. They were not in the interest of Southern men, or of Northern men, particularly, but in the interest of the people of the country. The laws which these provisions intended to repeal were passed originally to oppress the people of the South, and to disfranchise, imprison and persecute naturalized citizens of the North. He proposed to speak on the subject of the constitution, if that instrument may be mentioned without irreverence. He then argued that trial by jury was a shield of the people and a safeguard to liberty, and that the laws proposed to be repealed were enacted in the interest of the Republican party. Though no Jeffreys may hold his bloody assizes in this country, yet, in a minor degree, if not to the full extent, if these enormities should be continued, the courts of justice, as Hallam says, would become caverns of judicial murders and mere instrumentalities of party feeling and personal advantage. In the pacification of the country and the restoration of harmony everywhere we should go back to the old paths of justice.

Under sections 820 and 821 all the parties in a suit and all the counsel are satisfied. In steps the United States District Attorney and calls the court's attention to the presence in the jury-box of men who gave aid and comfort to the Rebellion by clothing a poor soldier, whose bare feet were bleeding in the frost and snow, and for being so vile as to believe that the story of the good Samaritan was told us for our imitation. Those men are excluded from the box, if the Judge so directs. This is not an impossible case. It has taken place since we have been in this Chamber. Such laws would disgrace Dahomey. Was the demand to return to the old, well-trodden paths of justice and legal procedure a matter to fire the Northern mind and set all the demagogues north of Mason and Dixon's line declaiming against the designs of the Democratic party? It is not easy, continued Mr. Thurman, to provide a remedy for existing defects. Experience has proved that when you undertake to remodel a jury system where there are apt to be political questions, it is essential that you provide against juries consisting of men of one political party alone. We cannot avoid taking notice of political parties. We take such notice in our State laws by providing that judges of election shall be chosen from different parties, and in our Federal laws, by a similar provision in regard to Supervisors. We are compelled as practical men to recognize the fact that in this, as in all free countries, there are different political parties, and therefore the proposition in the pending bill, that the names of the jurors be placed in a box by the Clerk of the court, and by a jury Commissioner of a different political faith from that of the clerk, and that the names shall be so put in alternately, is not open to criticism because it recognizes political parties.
